In Which Burton Proposes

If the Chronicle had not sent Laurel Stone to interview Granville Burton things might have gone on as they were for both of them. But Burton wanted to take care of his child-wife and to Laurel Burton was the one man in the world.

CHAPTER X

It was strange how Granville's presence in her life changed Laurel for a time from a self-reliant young newspaper woman to a questioning little girl. She was content when she was with him to drift, to let him do things for her, to have him plan for her pleasure. Of course, it was only a phase, but it was an interesting one and she had plainly how much he cared.

The night he asked her to marry him they had come home from some affair they had done together with her—a and he had come upstairs with her—a and she had gone to bed. Winona had gone to bed. Laurel slipped out of her cloak and sat down in the big armchair. Her heart was beating so that it seemed to shake her body. She could not think clearly. He had flung his light coat and his hat down on the couch, and he drew a chair over beside her. His first words were simple and were those of a man carried away by passion.

"You know that I want to marry you," he said.

Laurel's cool fingers moved restlessly in his, and she did not answer. In the dimness of the room his splendid eyes that made her catch her breath, and he drew a chair over beside her. His first words were simple and were those of a man carried away by passion.

"I can make you happy," he said.

Happy? She could have laughed at that. Why, no one in the world could give her happiness if he could not. Nothing would be left to her in life if he went out of it.

She laughed a little, and the sound was soft in the room. He stood up suddenly and drew her out of the chair into his arms. She stood straight as a flame in his embrace, and she threw back her splendid eyes, and looked at him.

Love is something that cannot be easily defined. Love can be as all-shake her body. She could not think clearly. He had flung his light coat and his hat down on the couch, and he drew a chair over beside her. His first words were simple and were those of a man carried away by passion.

There is no reason for delay," was his argument.

If Laurel thought that his hurrying of the marriage was due to his impatience, she was mistaken. It was because he was eager to have the thing over, to have the family know, to get his life back to normal. Laurel was to help in making his life smooth; she was not intended to interfere with anything.

"Let it be soon—next week, if possible," he said, sitting back in his chair, with one knee thrown carelessly over the other, his splendid head thrown back and that dominant note in his voice.

"And I can make arrangements to have it done quietly. You can give up the idea of a big wedding, can't you?"

"I never did want a big wedding," Laurel said quietly.

Granville remembered suddenly his own wedding, the big, dim church, the crowds of people, the ribbon-confined aisles, the string of bridesmaids and Ruth, pale and sweet, standing beside him in a mist of tulle, with the smell of hot-house flowers heavy in the air about them.

"Tomorrow—the ring and what goes with it."

"The Woman's Exchange"

Dear Madam—Your column is very interesting. I have the EVENING PUBLIC LEDGER every evening, and enjoy the Woman's Page immensely. Will you please tell me how I can remove mustard stains from a deep-brown plaid skirt? I have sent it to a cleaner, but he claims he cannot remove them. The skirt has been worn only a few times, and I would feel sorry to have it thrown away. Also, can you tell me if there is possibly a free school or place where typing and shorthand are taught?

How can moles or crows feet be gotten rid of and prevented from spreading? I have a light delicate skin and soap tends to make it have a scaly appearance. What can be used instead of soap? I have blond hair and it seems to be getting darker each day. What can be done without bleaching it?

MISS EVELYN.

I am glad you enjoy the Woman's Page. I am afraid I cannot help you with the mustard stains. If a professional cleaner cannot get them out, they evidently will not come out! It is too bad to have the skirt spoiled. You might have it dyed in brown dye. The plaid would probably still show, you know, and would be only a little fainter, and the stains would at least be made less noticeable by the dye.

I do not know of any place where stenography is taught free. Perhaps some of the readers of the column would help you out by suggesting a place. Massage will smooth out wrinkles to at certain extent, and there are astringent lotions that are said to be helpful for this, too, but nothing actually prevents them. If soap makes your skin dry and scaly, do not use it at all. There are plenty of good cleansing creams which have the same effect as soap and keep the skin soft and smooth. Try using honey and almond cream to soften your skin and make it smooth. Hairdressers say that when your hair gets darker all the time your scalp is in bad condition. Treatment is the only thing that will prevent this. Adding a little lemon juice to the rinse water when you wash your hair sometimes helps to keep it light.

Wants Bobbed Hair

To the Editor of Woman's Page: Dear Madam—Could you please tell me if it still is the style for a girl to wear the hair bobbed? I have been considering having my hair cut short in the Dutch style of bobbed hair, as it would be very becoming to me. Is the Dutch style considered the correct style of bobbed hair for a girl of seventeen years of age (by the Dutch style I mean bobbed hair with bangs)? Do you think bobbed hair is a good style for hair dressing for girls of my age?

Hoping that I have not asked too much of you and you will answer my questions in your very valuable and also very interesting column.

CONSTANT READER.

Bobbed hair is not the usual style of hairdressing for a girl of seventeen, but it is still worn occasionally by girls who look well that way. Be sure that it is becoming before you do it, because there is nothing so dreadful as becoming as bobbed hair on a girl whose face is too grown-up, or too large, or too serious for it. You know the most important part of a style in hairdressing is its effect upon you, no matter whether everybody else is using it or not. If the bangs are becoming, by all means have them, but if not, then try the parted hair, which is also popular.
