"SMELL" SQUAD AT WORK

Sanitary Detectives Sniff for Offensive Odors

"The odor squad'll get you if you don't watch out." A force of "smell detectives," men with extraordinarily keen olfactory nerves, has been established to ferret out the sources of offensive smells reported by citizens in various sections of the city.

AGED MAN, SUICIDE

Israel Gombarg, seventy-five years, 717 McClellan street, was found late yesterday afternoon in his bed with a gas hose in his mouth.

George H. Shaw, chief of the division of housing and sanitation, directs the work of the "smell detectives."

The "smell detectives" are men who do not use tobacco are used on the force because their sense of smell is considered better and more certain. The detectives work along the same plan as a bloodhound. They go to the vicinity from which bad odors are reported. There they sniff the air until they get a good whiff of the complained odor and then trace it to its lair. The health authorities then compel the removal of the cause.
