Why Don't Boys Close Eyes

Dear Cynthia—There's a question I'd like to ast Buck Private or any of the readers who would and could answer it. Buck, you asked why the girls all close their eyes when they are being kissed. Well, by now you must have enough answers to satisfy you, so please t me ask you this: Why don't the boys close their eyes Why don't the boys close their eyes when they kiss a girl? In the case of a girl, she usually closes her eyes when she loves the man (because, although you seemed to think they all close their eyes. I know a good many that don't) but even a man deesn't always close his eyes when he's kissing the "most won-derful girl in the world." What have you got to say about it?

Is it because they want to see what effect their kisses have on the girl; how she nots and everything? I don't bea place to be happy in.

And that's just what Jack's mother means it to be. She learned long ago that when little boys and little girls are not allowed to play freely in their own homes they go somewhere class. She found out that it would never do to have things so good-looking and new in her house that her family had to be uncomfortable to keep them that way. She knows that a house full of shiny floors and beautiful furniture isn't anything like so desirable as a house full of happy children. And so she aims at comfort, rather than beauty at convenience rather than convention.

SHE meant it only as an idle remark, "just to pass the time away."

But after a while, when Frankie gets a little older and still seems to prefer Jack's house to his own, perhaps the truth of it will come home to her. He does like it better than his own. He can ohase Huns there to his heart's content; he can be an automobile, or a horse, or an elephant with a long trunk, in that house, and he is not forever fearing the sound of that voice behind him.
