

DREAMLAND ADVENTURES
THE MEDICINE MAN

(Peggy and Billy taken by a charm back to the long ago, receive Chief Eagle Feather and his braves from Red Dog's savages who are about to burn them at the stake. Then Eagle Feather's Indians capture Red Dog's warriors and prepare to burn them.)

Watampoo Appears

PEGGY and Billy certainly were upset. They had just saved Chief Eagle Feather, father of Flashing Eye and Little Bear, from being burned at the stake by Red Dog's band, and now here were Red Dog's own boys trying to save their father from being burned by Chief Eagle Feather.

Red Dog's sons were thinking only of saving their father and did not see Peggy and Billy, who were riding on Baldy Sam's back. Billy was afraid the Indian lads might shoot with their bows and arrows, so he used his trusty Jasso. In a jiffy he had the nose over their heads and they were prisoners.

The sons of Red Dog were terribly scared.

"White Spirits... and the Roaring Demon! Oh! Oh!" they groaned.

"White Spirits who are your friends and will help save your father and his people," whispered Peggy. The Indian youngsters were so frightened they didn't know whether to believe this, but they quickly decided when Billy told them to climb a tree and hide there until their father could be rescued.

Peggy and Billy galloped into Eagle Feather's village and found it as full of excitement as a town on circus day. Indian braves were dancing and howling around the captives; Indian squaws were bringing firewood with which to burn them; Indian boys were shouting and firing arrows into the air; Indian dogs were barking and yelping.

All the racket stopped in an instant as Peggy, Billy and Baldy Sam appeared. The squaws and the boys and the girls hadn't yet seen the White Spirits and the Howling Demon, as they called Peggy, Billy and Baldy Sam, and they were as much astonished at the sight of the white children and the mule as the braves had been.

They were even more astonished at the first words which Peggy spoke. "You must set free Red Dog and his warriors," she said to Chief Eagle Feather. "You must let them go home without harm, even as you have come back safe and sound."

"Ugh!" grunted Eagle Feather, starting at her with amazed eyes. "Ugh!" grunted the braves, the squaws, the Indian boys and girls and even the captives themselves. It wasn't the Indian way to set free those who were held in their power. "Ugh!" grunted Eagle Feather again. "They would have burned us; how we burn them."

"Ugh! Kill our enemies!" agreed all the Indians.

"You should love your enemies," declared Billy. At that the Indians grunted in greater astonishment than before. They were savages and in the long, long ago time the missionaries had not yet brought the message of love, of good will, of forgiveness.

Then up spoke old Watampoo, the village medicine man. He was jealous of the White Spirits. He was afraid this new doctrine of love would rob him of the evil power he held over the Indians.

"Ugh! White Spirits are friends of our foes," he said. "They would work evil to us."

"Was it evil to save your braves and bring them safely back to you?" cried Peggy quickly.

"We are your friends. We tell you to set these others free because it is right to do so," declared Billy.

"Ugh! Watampoo, whose wisdom and whose magical power you know of old, bids you to kill them, for that is right," screamed the medicine man.

The Indians looked from the White

Spirits to Watampoo in dismay. They didn't know what to do. Chief Eagle Feather thought long and frowningly, then he spoke his judgment.

"White Spirits says to love our enemies and set them free; wise old Watampoo, our medicine man, says to hate them and burn them. Which is right? Let White Spirits and Watampoo work magic that from it we may learn in whom lies the truth."

(Tomorrow will be told what happens in the test of magic.)
