Laurel Comes Back

Laurel Stone marries Granville Burton after she has interviewed him for the Chronicle. She is in love with him and does not discover until after her marriage that he loves only himself and that she is merely the mother of his two little girls and the mistress of his town and country houses. A year after the marriage a son is born, and Laurel changes in attitude toward her husband. She becomes eagerly impersonal and real interest on his part develops into quick emotion. Both in love, they play at cross purposes.

Laurel settled herself and her baby in the old house of Main street and lived almost as she had lived when she had been a girl full of dreams and high aspirations, longing to do big things in the world. She had her old room and slept, dreamlessly, through the long nights. The baby and Miss Phillips had the room next to hers and every morning after his bath Granville Junior was carried in and given to his grandfather, who was inordinately proud of him. Slowly Geoffrey Stone grew stronger, although the doctor told Laurel that he would never be really well again. He had a chronic ailment and did not regain his strength as he should have after his attack.

Laurel's old friends rallied around her and gave affairs for her. George Stoddard had married Ethel Bane, a girl who had been at college with Laurel. Ethel was pretty and discontented with life in Westbury. She gave a garden party in the grounds of the pretty little cottage where she lived, and invited all the townspeople to meet Laurel, and then she was frightfully jealous because George paid more attention to the guest than he should have. It was all very strange and "small town," and yet as Laurel reflected it was not so different from affairs all over the world.

Granville wrote to her curt, business-like letters which she answered in the same way. One day a letter came to her on business stationery with the Chronicle in bold blue letters at the top of the envelope. It was typewritten and was from Tom Benton. She read it through delightedly. Winona must have told Tom that Laurel had gone home. Tom had put the best of himself in the letter and had suggested in it that Laurel try writing again. It set her thoughts revolving in an entirely different channel and it was for this reason that Tom had thought of the idea.

Laurel had never tried fiction, but here in the sleepy old town, with no household duties, and with Mary spoiling her fearfully and bringing coffee and home-made rolls to her room each morning, the idea appealed to her as worth trying. She decided to write a story about just such a girl as Ethel Bane, and to set it in just such a town as Westbury. She wrote the story on sleepy afternoons, sitting in the rocker in her own room with a copy pad on her knee. She took it down to the News when it was finished and typed it on her old typewriter to the delight of the staff. She chatted with the managing editor who had given her her first job and looked up all the people she had known in the old days. Then she sent the story off to a magazine and promptly forgot all about it.

Three weeks from the day that Laurel arrived in Westbury, Mr. Stone came downstairs. The fact that her father was so much better made her feel that she ought to be going home, and yet the thought of going home somehow filled her with dread. She liked to be hidden out here in this little town with her baby. She was drifting along sublimely content, not looking ahead very far, and not worrying. It was a queer little letter from Dulcie that made her realize the fact that she ought to go back. It was a wistful little letter and brought the tears to Laurel's eyes. She announced to her mother that morning that it was time she went home.

Laurel arrived at the Pennsylvania station on a beautiful morning in early September. She had not written that she was coming, and there was no one to meet her. They journeyed down to The Cedars and went up from the station in a taxi. Laurel's heart beat fast as the car wound up the driveway and under the cool portico. She smiled gaily at Crombie who came out to meet them protesting at the fact that she had not let them know. And then she was home again, the luxuriantness of the big cool room that stretched away into vistas of comfort, the smell of flowers everywhere, and then the children, Dulcie with tears of happiness running down her cheeks, clutching Laurel, clinging to her, and Grace proudly holding Junior and looking at her mother with shining eyes filled with happiness.

"It hasn't been like home without you," Miss Burke said quietly. "And Mr. Burton?" Laurel said finally to Miss Burke.

"Father has been very gay," said Grace. "He's been going to the country club every night. Aunt Harriet says he's discovered possibilities in the younger set. What did she mean?" Tomorrow—The Meeting.
