What to Do

By CYNTHIA

For the Old-Fashioned Girl

The answer to the question as to whether men desire a girl to be "modified from the Trinity to the pagan Irish he used this plant as a symbol of the great mystery.

A nonular St. Patrick luncheon:
For five people:

Irish Canape

Young Onions
Filets of Lamb. Denegal Style
Irish Potatoes
Southern Cucumber Salad
Paddie's Pudding
Cream Sauce
Tea

Irish Canape

Mince fine three green peppers. Add:

Three tenspoons of finely minced and becomed bacon.

The answer to the question as to whether men desire a girl to be "modified from the trom of the great myster" or "old-fashioned" (to use two terms that are so often unused) is that the men are almost universally and unanimously in favor of the "old-fashioned" type of girl, but are generally affaid to admit it—another sign of the foolish trend of the times. Will the feminine readers of your admirable column pardon me when I say that men look with mistrust and some suspicion upon the girl who, to use the vernacular, "has a different date for every night in the week" and thinks more of pleasure than of home or church? They have the week of courage in this respect or to a desire to avoid friction with their feminical acquaintances (man always loves peace, you know).

This is the belief of men (and I know whereof I speak, as there is nothing in the social curriculum that has not been mine). Men today admire and revere (despite their assertions to the "modern' type of girl), the girl who is sweet and good, who holds dear and sacred what should be held so, who respects man as a man and not as a money-scale with tablespoons cornstarch.

like that is better than the "snappy, dashy" kind we see so much of? He is twenty-three and I twenty. He will be finished his course in a year or so and I would like to know him even better than I do. I have plenty of dates, Cynthia, and most of the boys I go with are not so careful in act or speech as he. Indeed, he has been called formal by some friends, but honestly, he is not when you know him. He never makes himself so bold as to attempt to kiss me, though he says he sees no objection to people kissing when they are going to be married. But we are only good friends as yet. Is he right, Cynthia? I sometimes think in my heart that he is, for he has higher ideals than other boys I know, and yet I do not wish to think that I should not "cinsh around wildly." as they say, and have a good time every night. He urges me to take one or two nights a week and study or read something besides novels or love stories and is even willing to stay in with me and help me. Other boys always nraise me and say I know. PETITE. My dear, you do not recognize a treasure when you see one. The young man has the right and true ideals; guard his friendship.

She's for One Who Gads Not Dear Cynthia—In answer to A's and B's question in last Saturday's paper. I think the mar who does not run around much with girls is more likely to marry than one who goes about a great deal. He is of a more serious turn of mind and mere likely to want to settle down and more likely to want to settle down.

A Visit From Harriet

THE GLAD SURRENDER

In choosing a wife, Granville Burton decided that he would marry an independent working woman, inas-niuch as his first wife, a society girl, had seemed to him one of a type. Laurel Stone interested him because she did not classify, and after she had interviewed him for the Chronicle he decided to marry her. There was no emotion in his attitude. He was marrying for material reasons. Laurel did not discover his attitude until after her marriage, and after their son was born she changed toward her husband. Her indifference aroused first interest in then love and the realization that his feeling was not returned.

Clipping which I have cut out of the EVENING PUBLIC LEDGER of a girl's dress. Can you tell me where I can had recalled that afternoon she had left, the gray murkiness of the day, the hint of rain in the air, and the sudden please let me know and I will send for glimpse of Granville seen from her window, seated in the big touring car with Marion Worth.

Harriet came over in the afternoon.
She drove her own little runabout, and brought Marion Worth. There was a look about the girl that had never been there before, an added assurance that was very becoming, a little defiant attitude that added verve to her rather coloraless. Marion Worth.

"Yes, and he does it beautifully, so much better than most of the men. He's in great demand among the girls these days," she laughed a light mirth-less laugh—that cultivated laugh that is so often-a duty rather than a relaxation. Crombie appeared with tea and little sandwiches and frosted cakes, and, as Laurel's hands wandered around among the cups the car appeared at the edge of the drive and a moment later Granville was moving toward her. She sum-moned every bit of self-control and pride to her aid as she smiled up at him, both of her hands occupied with the tea. "Surprise, surprise," she said, gaily.

Then she finished with the tea things and gave him her hand.
Caught off his guard, his eyes were devouring her. He sat on the arm of the chair next to hers and did not take his gaze off her once. Laurel was conscious of his look, but she went on composedly with what she was doing and they all chatted in a desultory fashion about the trip.

Marion rose finally, drawing on her gloves and gulling out a small vanity box, which she used daintily.
