OUNTING next Tuesday's opera, the Utille of which we know, there are but four more performances in the pres-ent season, and again Philadelphia has ent season, and again Philadelphia has not seen, nor are we likely to see, the real novelties of the year, "The Blue Bird" and "Parsifal," to say nothing of "Oberon," which was given a num-ber of times in New York last year, but was not brought here. Apropos of this situation regarding Philadelphia's operatic diet, Mr. Gatti has issued a couple of statements about the general desirability of Philadelphiaus (although he did not put it ouite se the general desirability of Philadelphiaus (although he did not put it quite so bluntly) hearing "Il Trovatore" at least once a year, and another about the im-possibility of giving "La Forza del Des. tino" until he had just the cast de-manded by the opera, which it cannot be denied that he has. Frankly, both of them read a little as though Mr. Gatti thought he ought to make something like an apology for these two veterans in a season of only sixteen performances, but this may not sixteen performances, but this may not have been the case. Of course, "La Forza del Destino" provides one of the operas for Mr. Caruso, and this may have had something to do with its se-lection for Philadelphia for a second onsecutive year.

Now no one can say with justice that "Il Trovatore" is not a great opera. It has some very evident weaknesses but it has kept the boards successfully for more than sixty-seven years in the face of the most violent criticism hurled at a work of its kind. What is more, it will doubtless be there for a good many more years, as its fund of melody overbalances all other considerations with an audience, even a thorsughly musical one, including the fact that it has probably the most absurd plot ever set to serious operatic music. One can say the same thing about the libretto of "La Forza del Destino," but it cannot truthfully be said that the music is much more than mediocre throughout most of the opera. It is by no means Verdi at his best, and when was revived last year, after a long and well-deserved oblivion, no one thought that it would last more than one season. But here we are to have it again next
