THE GLAD SURRENDER

By HAZEL DEYO BATCHELOR

Further Misundersstanding

When Laurel Stone married Graneille Burton she surrendered every-thing gladly to him. She went into a different world quite fearlessly, for Granville Burton had a great deal of tranville furton had a great deal of morey and his people were not her people, they were not the workers of the world. Just after her mar-riage she discovered the coldness of ringe she discovered the caldness of the man and his reasons for marrying her, which were purely material. A year after that Junior is born. Then Laurel withdraws herself. She makes herself over into the kind of woman she thinks he wants, only to have Granville discover his love for his wife, a love that overleaps all barriers, all volutables. At a masked ball he wife, a love that overleaps at barriers, all obstacles. At a masked ball he makes love to her under the guise of a stranger and Laurel misunderstands. Desperate because he feels her unhappiness and is certain that he has killed her love, he offers her

"DERHAPS you would like to think PERHAPS you would like to think it over." he went on. "I will do anything you say, do anything you like, to make it easy for you."

She was so silent in the big chair, sloof from him, her beautiful brows drawn straight above her eyes, thinking, thinking—he wondered about what.
"And Junior?" she asked after a few minutes.

minutes.
Junior! He hadn't thought of the Junior! He hadn't thought of the baby. Up to that very minute he had not given a single thought to his son. The fact was astounding. Everything seemed so small in comparison with the fact that he was giving up Laurel, that she was going out of his life, that perhaps some time far in the future she was going to find happiness with some other man—that happiness that he had not troubled to give her.

He closed his eyes a moment, but she was not looking at him.
"Whatever you say," he said finally, his voice low.

she was not looking at him.

"Whatever you say," he said finally, his voice low.

Here was her triumph. Here was Granville Burton at her feet, surrendering to her. He had offered her her freedom, with the custody of their son that son that he had wanted most of anything in the world. Laurel knew how much he loved the baby. She had watched Granville pick up the tiny thing in his arms, and she had watched his cold, gray eyes light to sudden warmth, as they did not light at anything else, save, perhaps—and the thought made her suddenly tremble—save, perhaps, the way they had blazed through the black mask the other night when he had held her in his arms. She shook off the suddenly weakness that threatened to overpower her. Why did ashe keep thinking of the other night? Granville was, after all, a man, and he had taken a deliberate advantage of circumstances to kiss her as he might have kissed any other pretty woman. It was easier to kiss one's wife; there would be less scandal about it. She remembered the night he had asked her to be his wife and had taken ber in his arms. She could hear now the roar of the city about them as they stood in the darkness together and the way he had kissed her then. It had been that kiss that had deceived her. It had been that kiss that had convinced her of his love. And after all he bad kissed her that way only that once. It had been merely begains he was a man influenced for a moment by the time and the unusual emotion of the moment. His treatment of her afterward had been purely mechanical, kind and courteous, but passionless.

And yet with victory in her hands of passionless.

And yet with victory in her hands she loved him too much to hurt him that much and, woman-like, she postponed the decision.
"Shall we think over the best possible ay out?" she asked after a minute. Laurel was not really reasoning, she purposely misunderstanding. she had stopped to use logic she would have seen that Grarville's attitude about have seen that Grarville's attitude about Junior precluded any selfishness on his part in the matter. But she was sick at heart and overwrought. Her world was crumbling about her. Her pride kept her from holding Granville at any cost now that he had offered her freedom, and yet she at that moment could not accept his offer. The one thing she could do was to postpone the ultimate issue.

mate issue.

"About the other night," he said fically. "I want to apologize. I lost my head, I guess. I know I had no right, at least you had given me to understand that I had no right, that you did not want those things. There is nothing I can do excepting to say that I am sorry."

If you will send me a self-addressed envelope I will give you the pames of some sewing machine dealers here in this city. I could not give the list in He wasn't sorry; he was tiercely glad. Those few minutes had given him something to go on with, to remember in the future. But unconsciously he was confirming Laurel's belief that it had simply been a lapse of self-control on his part, that he wanted to kiss any fairly attractive woman, alone with him in the mystery of the garden, and with the witchery of the masks and fancy costumes to add to the unreality of everything. tumes to add to the unreality of everything.

Laurel drew a long breath and rose slowly. "We must think of the best way out." she said evenly. "I know how much your name means to you, and I don't want to have any talk or scandal. It is best not to decide anything hastily for the sake of the children."

They stood facing each other and finally Granville spoke. "I want you to consider yourself and no one else," he said.

"Good night," Laurel said softly, and turned away.

Sturtevant Turbo-Generator Set

CTURTEVANT power machinery was developed to fulfil the need for sturdy, simple machinery to successfully operate Sturtevant air apparatus. Every Sturtevant product is noted for its solid construction. For more than sixty years it has been Sturtevant shop practice to let nothing interfere with the production of only the highest type

A Maximum of Power in a Minimum of Space

A Sturtevant Turbo-Generating Set makes a very desirable lighting and power unit. It is so simple that no constant attention need be given it. An efficient regulating device prevents the turbine's overspeeding and permits a constant voltage to be maintained.

This set requires only limited head-room. A Sturtevant Turbo-Generating Set is so smoothrunning and so finely balanced that no foundation other than the cast-iron sub-base is needed. These sets are efficient either as prime movers
