is gray and clusive in life and charac-ter-inchoate feelings that grip and con-tells of the supreme moment of love of a man and woman, the ecstatic peal of love, after years of routine living. It is delicately astir with romance. "Doctor Adriaan" is almost Ibsen-esque in its relentless probing of emo-tions and motives. It is a study in family psychology. Couperus shows with unerring intuition and remarka-ble insight the growth of a great soul in the cramping environment of small souls, of pusillanimous persons whose native force is run down. In the hero is concentrated all that remains positive and affirmative in his family's blood. He is very humanly drawn, very idealisti-and admirably communicative of the message of Couperus.
