THE GLAD SURRENDER

By HAZEL DEYO BATCHELOR Copyright, 1920, by Public Ledger Co. Love Triumphs

Granville Burton married Laurel Stone, a newspaper woman, when he did not love her, save as a companion. She loved him with all her intense nature. After their son was born, she, through pride, withdrew herself from him. She was as she always had been, save that there was nothing personal between them, and Granville, who at once realized that she loved his wife with everything that was in him and that she no longer loved him.

THE car drew up at the curb with a purring softness and Laurel went wearily up the steps and rang the bell. Crombie opened the door and stepped back for her to enter. He was about to tell her something, but with a little gesture she stopped him.

"Tomorrow morning, Crombie," she said with a tired laugh. "I'm really too utterly weary to hear anything tonight. I'm going right up."

She began to climb the curving stairs when a voice spoke out of the darkness. "Laurel!"

"Why didn't you leave tonight?" she asked softly. There was something about the unexpectedness of the meeting that made her say the things that came into her mind, no matter what the consequences.

"Because we hadn't settled matters," he began. "I had no intention of rushing off that way. I wanted to explain to you that I would go and leave the field free for you to do just as you liked. Then when you had decided you could let me know."

"That's all," he finished. "I didn't tell you that to influence you, but because I wanted you to know. You are free to do just as you want with your life. The children are not to count. I am not to count. You must decide. And now good-night."

She turned away, and suddenly she could speak. Suddenly she knew that she must never misunderstand her again. "Gran," she said breathlessly.

"I'm free," she began. "Free to do as I like with my life. There is only one thing to do with it; there is only one thing I want to do with it—give it back to you forever."

Then she was gone, flying up the curving stairs into the soft darkness beyond.

SUPPOSE your father made you wear ugly clothes; suppose he wouldn't let you have a good time; suppose he wouldn't even allow you to go out with a suitor with another girl. Then suppose he chose a husband for you after you had chosen a different one for yourself. Would you let him rule you in that, too? Read how Anne Carter handled this situation in
