The essence of the best of all the modern schools lies in the opera, which, while a departure from the generally lyric style of the Italian composers, whether classic or modern, is still essentially Italian in feeling. As befits a work tragic from first to last and in all its details, there is no place where pure melody is required, or, for that matter, where it would fit in with the generally depressing story. It is trage dy, not melodrama, and the music is always in the proper tone and spirit with the dramatic action.
