Philadelphia and Boston Have Dropped From World's Greatest to Lowest Notch in Both Major Leagues Since Fat Years of Pennant Glory

Ballade of the Day Before Now is the high tide of the game Where hope eternal crowns each face : Where each young star leaps out to fame Before he strikes his normal pace : But when he's helped to blow the race. Through errors, boots and countless boncs. Aye, when his club's in seventh place. How soon the cheering turns to groans.

For Meenty years I've watched them start. Each in the pink of April glow : With jumping pulse and pounding heart Free waited for the opening blow; But pennant dreams of spring soon grow As dull and dreary as this verse : Why should we grudge the April show When by July they weep and curse?

That Grover Cleveland Alexander will again lead the National League 5. That the battle for last place in both leagues will be between Boston and Philadelphia. That Last Bendlation

Famous Basketball Tutor Gives Up Post-McNichol Next

Year's Captain

Owing to the pressure of business Lon Jourdet, the ablest and most successful basketball coach that ever tutored the Red and Blue, has decided to give up his athletic work. He made this an-nouncement last night at the dinner given the intercollegiate champions at the University Club.

The University Club. Every one interested not only in bas-ketball, but in Penn, will hear this de-cision with extreme regret. Jourdet, who was during his college career a member of the basketball and football teams, has made a reputation as a cage coach that parallels that of the greatest athletic instructors in America.

Jourdet led Penn basketball teams to four successive Intercollegiate League championships, winning permanent pos-session of the Heppe trophy during the senson just closed, as well as piloted the Red and Blue to the highest possible pinnacle in the college basketball world through the recent victory over Chicago in the series for the American cage

Danny McNichol, the star guard, was the unanimous choice of the team to lead next year's quintet. This is the second time that the local lad has been honored by being elected captain of a Penn team within two weeks, he having recently been elected captain of the baseball team.
