Cherry Doesn't Understand

Anne Carter has an unhappy childhood. Her father has a cruel nature, hood. Her father has a cruel nature, and when she is seven, tries to break and put it away. She undressed slowly, paused a moment to look at her white face in the glass, then blew out her be lamp and went to bed. She felt cold and pulled the bedelothing up to her chin. Her mind kept veering off into I strange channels, and when she finally dropped asleep she dreamed of bold dark eyes, and a farm that shut her away from the world. She thought she was there alone with Mr. Suyder, and that he was coming closer to her, that he was going to touch ber, and she opened her mouth to scream. Then John Porterfield appeared suddenly, and she felt safe.

The dream was still with her when she awoke the next morning; it haunted her. For the first time Anne's flesh crawled with fear of the unknown, with fear of her father's power over her, with fear of what she might be made to do. Once on that farm alone with Mr.
Snyder, there would be no one to help her. Her thoughts flew to John Porterfield. She would never see him again, never. She thought of his blue eyes, the flash of his teeth, and the square set of his blade and his steeth, and the square set of his head on his shoulders; they were pleasant things to remember. The fact that he had come to her in her dream and had saved her from some unknown and as surprising logical mind for a little was now as young, not yet eighteen, and in a few days she forgot the impression that her dream and created.

But Anne was young, not yet eighteen, and in a few days she forgot the impression that her dream and created. Even though her lite at home was young, not yet eighteen, and in a few days she forgot the impression that her dream and created. Even though her lite at home was the sum own of the steep of the sum of

The Loaf Unmatchable

Quality & Quantity

Of all the food kind nature provides for man's sustenance, wheat is nearest to a perfect summary of the constituent needs of the human body.

Victor is more than this, because added to the lifegiving properties of the wheat kernel, as represented in the finest of flour, are the fats, the heat producers, contained in the Best Lard, Granulated Sugar and Purest of

That is why there is more Victor used than any other; why our three big bakeries, with a combined weekly capacity of more than Two Million loaves, are kept busy night
