Nancy Wynne Tells of Pennsylvania Museum's Pageant—Last Opera of Season Tonight—Tommy Resents That Nurse

I WAS awfully surprised to learn that the temple which has been given the Pennsylvania Museum by the Gibson family, and which was dedicated last night with music, dancing and song, is a building of the seventeenth century of our own era. Somehow I had an idea that it dated way back and had been excavated an' everything. But that as it was, it was very handsome and unusual and certainly its like has not been seen since. Virginia is glad she doesn't have to sit like that often. She was the most wonderful thing I ever saw. So like a statue and how on earth she sat in the position she did and danced and then got back into the queer position again. I cannot understand. I should think she would have been uncomfortable all over her body. And then her dance was a marvel. She third episode was a marvel. She was Mrs. John Harbeson and you know how remarkably she dances and acts.

Catherine Morris, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Morris, danced beautifully, too. She was most graceful and elegantly arrayed and her cousin, Sarah Lippincott, was simply exquisite in her Indian costume. I can't exactly tell you what it all meant, but it was a remarkable spectacle, and I enjoyed it all but the strange snake charmer who climbed to the top of one of the pinnacles of said temple and proceeded to carry on greatly with a snake of such unusual size that he attracted a bit too much attention from me as part of the scene. However as Mrs. Harbeson and Mrs. Nazel both began to do dances all eyes turned to them, for they were beautiful indeed.

TONIGHT we will have the last performance of this season's opera and it is likely to be a very crowded affair; for the opera is "Eugene Onegin," which has not been given in Philadelphia and which was recently in New York this season after about twenty years. Then, too, with the question still in the air as to whether there will be opera next year at the Metropolitan or not, every one will want to go to what might be the last performance in that great and beautiful house.

It is hardly likely, I think. Surely there are enough real music and opera lovers in this city to back up the financial end of it. And I have a hunch they will. Of course, it would be more convenient for most of us if it were given at the old Academy of Music, because it is more central, but the seating capacity of the Metropolitan is so much greater and the house is so up to date.

However, that is neither here nor there with regard to tonight's performance. The Bertram Lippincotts will entertain tonight, among their guests being Mr. and Mrs. Chalemagne Tower, who returned this morning from New York, where he had been staying for a short time after their son Rodger's marriage. You know, that was yesterday afternoon. And didn't they have lovely weather?

Of course, it is a matter of superstition, but I do like to feel that the sun shines on a wedding.

WILL you ever forget the rain on the day Violet Whelen and Malcolm Greenough were married in Holy Trinity Church? Of course, it was all coincidence: but when he died some months later, and she died ten months after him, he and his brother ten days after her death, it was as if on the same years later both her father and mother within a few hours of each other, every one said. "Will you ever forget the day Violet was married?"

That was a very happy union, so the rain did not mean unhappiness in married life. I heard the other day that the little boy born of that marriage went back to Cleveland to live with the Greenoughs, after his grandparents here died, is developing into a fine lad. He must be ten or twelve years old now. Isn't it wonderful how time flies?

I SAW Mrs. Hutchins Scott on Walnut street the other day wearing a stunning hat. It was of dark blue straw and apparently hand-made. The crown was surrounded by dark blue and white velvet flowers which were sewed close to the hat. Mrs. Scott's dress was of dark blue and looked very smart.

Mrs. Richard Berridge, who with her children, has been spending the last year with her mother, Mrs. Robert Lester, is wearing a very good-looking sports suit of brown tweed made with a choker-collar and rather long coat. Her hat is a small fawn-colored model faced with dark brown and has spring flowers about the crown.

MASTER TOMMY is six years old and has been taught all the rules of propriety by a carefully a careful mother. Lately Tommy has been annoyed by the presence of a white-garmented person, who came to the house to stay the same time baby sister arrived. And this stiff-garmented person seems to guard mother's room and won't let Tommy go in whenever he wants to. Tommy has got tired of it, he's only been allowed to play a wee kiss on mother's cheek, and when he tiptoes over to the crib where that sister's been wanting so long is sleeping and making all kinds of funny little soft sounds, he is only allowed to have a look and then has to go again. I tell you it is a feller mad! And then to have that white-garmented person walk herself into his room one night unheralded and he in his blue pajamas about to get into bed! Do you wonder he looked sternly in the eye and remarked: "Who gave you permission to come into my room?"
