CHAPTER V
They Find the Dragons
WHERE shall we find old Dragon
Cutworm and his family?" asked Billy, when the Breen growing fairles begged him and Peggy and Nanette to drive the dragons away from Nanette's garden. The green fairles answered with a whispery song:
"Hiding hiding underneath the ground.
Lurking, lurking, there they'll be found."
That answer didn't seem yery clear. found."
That answer didn't seem very clear.
As Billy looked over the hills and gullies of the garden—and the garden seemed to be all hills and gullies now that he and the other children were pin-size—he thought it would be a pretty hard job to find the dragons.

"Maybe we can get Mr. Robin to find them for us," said Peggy, who remembered how Mr. Robin, by listening with his sharp ears, had found the angleworm when it was out of sight in the earth. But the green fairles shook their heads.

"Old Dragon Cutworm is very wise," explained the green corn fairy. "The birds cannot catch him as they do the blind and stupid angleworms. He sleeps all day while the birds are about, and comes out only at night."

"And then he cuts and he cuts and he eats and he eats until there are no more growing things to cut and to eat," added the butter bean fairy.

"Go, go and seek the dragon's cave!" lisped all the green fairles.

themselves with sticks, set out to find the cave of the dragon. They climbed the ridges of dirt and they searched in the valleys, but no sign of dragons could they find.

At last, however, they came to a hole under a bank. This hole looked as though it might lead into a cave. Billy dug at it with his stick, and Peggy and Nanette joined him. In a short time they had made the hole as large as a door—that is, a door for pin-size folks. Creeping softly through the door they found it led into a very stuffy, smelly cave.

And in that cave creatures were sleeping. For a moment the children could not see what the creatures were, for they had come into the dimness of the cave from the bright sunlight and their eyes had to grow used to the gloom. But the moment they could see clearly, they took one good look at the creatures, and then fied.

The creatures were dragons. And they were horribly ugly dragons, round, fat, fuzzy, fierce-looking. No wonder the green growing fairies shuddered at the very thought of them.

The children didn't stop their flight until they reached the top of the bank. There they halted to talk over what they should do.

"Well, we have found the dragons," shuddered Nanette.

"Yes, and now that we have found them what are we going to do with them," replied Billy, as he looked doubtfully at the stick which he carried. "I know what we will do," she cried doubtfully at the stick which he carried. "Mr. Robin sees us. He will come to goble us up and then we will tumble out of sight under the bank. He will listen as he did when he caught the sounding very loud to their tiny ears. It was Mr. Robin coming back to the should be angleworm. He will hear the dragons in their cave, and drag them out just the dragons out of their cave.)

(Tomorrow will be told how Billy pels he dragons out of their cave.)
