Too."

When Peggy heard she was invited to the May party she hopped out of bed and hurried into her clothes. She didn't want to be late for the fun.

When she get out of doors she found she wasn't a bit too soon. The birds were already speeding to the party. Mosboot them were flying, but some of them were hopping along the ground, picking up bites of breakfast as they picking up bites of breakfast as they hopped. Even though they were going to a party they didn't mean to go hungry.

The gegry joined the hoppers. By running swiftly she could just keep up with ning swiftly she could just keep up into sep with lier. A little farther on Billy Gest came bleating out of the fields and added himself to the hoppers. Then Johnny Bull came running out of a farmyard where he had been picking a hone with the farmer's dog. He trotted along beside Peggy. All were very which Balky Sam was giving for Nanste and her guests from the city. Presently there came a sound of salloping behind them. Turning, they saw Balky Sam racing down the road toward Birdiand. On his back were four little children, two boys and two girls, all of them very white and thin. "Hee-haw! Hooray! Get out of the way! Here I come with Polly and Martha, Harry and Little Joe, all guests for my May party!" brayed Balky San, prancing and dancing as he saw Peggy with the animals and birds. "Whoo?" hooted Judge Owl from the shadows of the trees. "We are city children," they answered. "We live in attics near where Nanette lived before she moved to the country. She has invited us to come to a May party in Birdland." "It's my May party," brayed Balky San.
