previous renditions was lost, owing doubtless to the flat scating arrangement of the orchestra necessitated by the use of the chorus, which occupied the elevated seats usually used by the orchestra. However, this was a small matter when the tonal beauty and the spirit of the performance are taken into consideration. The temperamental mood of the overture made an admirable product for the majestic composition to for the majestic composition to

An Unique Composition

An Unique Composition

The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven occupies a position unique in musical composition. It is utterly different from any previous works, even of Beethoven himself, and its character is participated in by only three of his later compositions, the quartets in A minor. O sharp minor and F major, all of which were written after the Ninth Symphony. On the other hand, the work epitomized practically all that has been done in symphonic composition been done in symphonic composition since it was written, the indebtedness of Brahms, Dvorak and even some of of Brahms. Dvorak and even some of the Russians being apparent.

The emotional tone of the whole work is of the utmost seriousness, but it is never morbid, and while it has not that perfect unity which characterizes the fifth symphony (undoubtedly the finest specimen of cohesiveness of composition that exists) it nevertheless rises to heights which are not attained by any other work in the literature of music, with the possible exception of certain places in the Brahms Requiem and the Bach B minor Mass.

The performance of the work as a whole was magnificent. Mr. Stokowski conducted from memory, as usual, a tour de force of memory and not unaccompanied with dangers when the necessarily limited number of rethe necessarily limited number of re-hearsals with the chorus is considered, together with the fact that choral singhearsals with the fact that choral singing with orchestral accompaniment is always full of pitfalls. Nevertheless, everything went off almost faultlessly.

It is true that there were a few spots where the orchestral balance might have been better, as in the open fifths at the beginning of the first movement, with its sinister feeling of the lack of a defined tonality, which were too loud, the string unison at the end of the same movement, also too loud, and several places where the solo and accompanying instruments were not quite in the right relationship to each other as to volume, but these were due to the unusual seating formation. The three orchestral numbers of the symphony are involved and are almost altogether "tutti," especially the first movement, but they were played with great reverence they were played with great reverence and beauty of tone.

Fine Work of Chorus

Naturally, the main interest of the afternoon was in the work of the chorus, which was very fine. Beethoven was by no means a fine choral writer, in the sense that he knew how to get the finest effects of the voice in a "practical" vocal way, and the result is that the voice parts of the Ninth Symphony, the Mass in D and other of his greatest choral works are almost unsingable. In the face of this fact, the chorus did the highest grade of work, especially

The solo parts were taken well by Vahrah Hanbury, soprano; Alice Fid-ler, contralto; Robert Quait, tenor, and J. Campbell McInnes, baritone. As a rule, the solo parts are as unsingable as the choral ones, but all gave them with excellent voice and understanding. The horribly difficult passage commonly known as the "cadenza," for four solo voices, was one of the best bits of the performance.

The Friday afternoon concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra closed yesterday Philadelphia Orchestra closed yesterday in a blaze of glory with what was unquestionably the finest production of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that has ever been given in Philadelphia.
