Adventures With a Purse

You' have Helen to thank for this is not my adventure, for, strictly speaking, it is not my adventure at all. She came in yesterday fresh from a most exciting and satisfying shopping trip. "For weeks," she said, "I have threatened to buy a dress, but I honestly hated to start looking, what with prices and one thing and another." But, anyhow, to make a long stery short, if you know what I mean, she has bought her dress, and I hasten to tell you about it. It is a dark blue taffeta, with a round neel and red with a crisp little white collar and vest. The skirt is embroidered with round circles in gray yarn, and at each hip is a tiny wing that stands out perfly, giving a decided piquant effect. It, the dress, of course, had been reand cest. The skirt is emiorinered with round circles in gray yarn, and at each hip is a tiny wing that stands out pertly, giving a decided piquant effect. It, the dress, of course, had been re-duced to $27. Now I have no particular reason for supposing that you want a dress exactly like Helen's, although, dear knows, you could go far and do worse; but my point is this—there are other dresses at the same shop, very smart and at surprisingly reasonable

"What is that pretty piece that everybody is humming and all the or-chestras are playing?" questioned Dorothea, as she industriously sewed the hem of her new overblouse. Does it go like this?" I asked, as I took on a serious manner and carefully humaned the first few bars. "Yes," she ex-chaimed delightedly, "that's it." Now I have no doubt that you have heard it! for it has quite captured our city. But I thought that perhaps, like Dorothen, you do not know the name of it. But I shall be glad to tell you the name, and then when you go where I shall tell you and ask the nice mun to play it for you you will sigh with relief. SHE HUNG HER HANDBAG ON THE BACK OF HER CHAIR

So That It Lay on the Lap of the Woman Behind Her-When She Forgot It She Suspected the Other Woman of Having Taken It

SHE was sitting in a box at the theatre. Her handbag annoyed her by constantly sliding off her lap, and so she hung it carelessly over the back of the chair. The fact that it was almost on the lap of the woman behind her, and that it bumped the other woman's knees every time she moved made no difference to her. She calmly disposed of the bag, and went on to enjoy the play.

The other person forgot about the bag in the fascination of the stage before her. When the performance was over, she rose to go, gathered up her things, and started out of the boy. The
