The und startled her, and she sprang up of rar to the window keeping behind a white musin curtain. The car and the start of a street of the street. the white muslin curtain. The car rame on with a roar of an open culout and a grinding of gears, and the next minute Geraldine's big car drew up be-fore the house. Geraldine was not alone, for Dane Grey was with her and dear old Pierre the chauffeur. Anne had grown very fond of Pierre.

From her point of vantage, Anne look From her point of vantage, Anne look-ed hungrijy at Dane Grey. She loved him, she loved him, she thought exult-antly: there never would be any one again who could wake her heart to so rapturous a thrill: never any one who fulfiled so fully her ideal of what a man should be.

He sprang out and helped Geraldine to the sidewalk. Now they were com-ing up the flagged walk and Anne could hear them on the porch. Her heart beat suffocatingly in her throat, a diminess swam before her eyes and she raught the curtain with a trembling hand to stoady herself.

The bell rang through the house and nne stood motionless, waiting. She uid hear the mumble of their voices on rould hear the mumble of their voices on the porch, but sine could not hear what they said. It rang again, and then again, tearing Anne's heart with every peal. If only she could call to them, if only she could let them know that he was here locked up, if only they could take her away forever; but that was impossible. Her pride held her where she was, kept her from screaming aloud in her agony of mind. She could never go to Dane Grey that way, like a runaway in the night whom he might runaway in the night whom he might arry out of pity. And so she stood marry out of pity, and so she stood there with her red in held tightly be-tween her teeth until they finally left the porch and looked cagerly up at all the windows from the sidewalk. Waxed Paper

Two folds of waxed paper put over the top of the freezer, when freezing ice creams or sherbets of any custards kind, prevent any oil or salt from finding its way into the contents of the can. When the dessert is frozen, remove the Tairy giants," said Peggy. She and Billy quickly climbed the vines that twined around the tree to the door of Judge Owl's nest. There they counted, "one, two, three," and on the word "three." Billy whistled like an engine and Peggy acreamed like a witch. Then both dodged out of sight dasher and place two clean folds of paper on top of the can. This helps to keep the contents firm, as the waxed paper keeps out all air.—McCall's. out of sight

Economy Hint

After scalding your garbage pail, if you line it with about four thicknesses of newspaper you will find that your garbage can will last twice as long, as the newspaper prevents the acid from the garbage from eating its way into the can. MRS. M. S.
