

The Marriage Trifler

By HAZEL DEYO BACHELOR

Copyright, 1920, by Public Ledger Co.

Barbara Knight, the acknowledged leader of the young people of Keith Grant, the "biggest man" of the season. It is the popular belief that Barbara has everything, and both families are delighted at the thought that she is interested. October began the first of Barbara's affairs, and to the delight of Eleanor who had not gone back to Hill's Crest in the fall, Barbara came early to the first dinner party. She wraps up her sister's room and flings herself into one of the comfortable chairs.

THE end of the honeymoon brought the end of the ideal relationship between Keith and Barbara, although neither of them expected anything of the kind. Both were little madly in love, and Keith had almost forgotten the Barbara he had engaged in the woods. He had forgotten how attracted she could be, how full of importance she was, how deeply engrossed what seemed to him trivialities until back in the city, he saw her once more surrounded by the influences which had been a part of her since childhood.

He pleaded for a short time of peace and quiet in the new apartment, a time of readjustments, and then he moved "We must get ready to entertain. People expect it." She explained, "We mustn't be foolish, we mustn't be seen as a man and a woman, our own house would suddenly become soft, and she would come to him and cuddle up on the arm of his chair. 'You can't understand this, it isn't what I have in mind,' she would say. But we simply must."

The new apartment was quite pretentious. The drawing room was for giving parties, and once they were settled with three servants and a chauffeur, Barbara planned a series of dinners. These were to be elaborate, and supervised by Marcia who aided and abetted her in everything she did, scolding Keith for any objections that he might have as though he had been a child.

Keith did not entirely object to the dinners. He liked people, he liked to have them in his home, and most of all he liked Barbara. In some exquisitely arranged rooms, queening it over every one, he was inordinately proud of the admiring glances that followed him everywhere, and of the fact that Marcia was so much more in his presence than Barbara had the tact and finesse of a much older woman, that she could engineer anything, and that she was sure to have a brilliant social career.

He was proud of this from his mother, even while he secretly scoffed at the thought of a social career. He often wondered why women cared so much More-Lyte is just as good for rewhitening surfaces that have been previously painted as it is for finishing the brick, plaster or concrete walls of new plants. It has been used for many years at such plants as The Willys-Overland Company.

Its superior qualities are not affected by an under-coating of other paint, unless the latter has cracked or peeled.

We offer immediate deliveries from stock in gloss, semi-gloss or flat finish, at prices that should interest every manufacturer.

Barbara was trying the effect of two different neck ornaments. One was a string of pearls which had been her father's wedding present, the other was a diamond and sapphire cross which Keith had given her. Barbara studied her gravely, she flushed faintly under the carefully applied makeup.

Barbara turned away at last, puzzled, and inwardly a little bit ashamed of the fact that she, too, had almost decided to take the cross which Eleanor had given her; they had cost more. And yet Keith had given her the cross! Her heart failed and she snapped the most defiantly catching in the glass a slight shrug from Eleanor, who had risen carefully, and walked over to the pier liberally in the mirror, pulling at the soft tufts that swathed her shoulders.
