deing here?"

Bob responded quickly, "Your mother seked me for dinner."

Katherine went on into her tiny little bedroom which was done in yellow bedroom which was done in yellow chintz. She had made the curtains and covers herself, and the furniture consisted of some old pieces picked up second-hand and painted. The effect was fresh and dainty, however, and Katherine, turning on the light by her dressing table, smoothed her dark hair, tried to decide whether to change her clothes or not and decided in the negative. She went back to Bob and her mother, and dropped into a chair.

The fact that Bob was there excited mother, and dropped into a chair.

The fact that Bob was there excited no comment from her. He often dropped in to dinner informally, and he and Katherine always sparred at each other briskly. Tonight she had news to tell them, and it gave her a wicked little feeling of excitement to think of telling her news to Bob.

He flung down his newspaper and looked at her with slightly narrowed eyes. "Well?" he queried.

"Juess who's coming to our next

"Guess who's coming to our next Thursday night?" Katherine announced dramatically.

Mrs. Newbery looked up from her sewing. Bob continued to look at Katherine with narrowed eyes. There was a new excitement about her that was unusual. He was curious as to what had

"Keith Grant!"

"Why, Katherine," came in Mrs. Newbery's soft voice. Bob did not speak.

"I'm sorry for him." Katherine said quickly. "I think he's fine and splendid, and a real person. He wants to come "Why are you sorry for him?" Bob asked evenly.
"Oh, because, from the way he spoke, I think society bores him. I know how it would bore me, that eternal round of
