The Marriage Trifler By HAZEL DEVO BATCHELOR Copyright, 1980, by Public Ledger Co.

Barbara Knight and Keith Grant are married and with every good thing that the gods could give them, except common sense on Barbara's part, they begin their married life. They are genuinely in love, but Barbara has been brought up to be selfish. She does not think of marriage as a state where both persons' wishes must be considered, and because keith's ideas are different from here she makes no effort to compromise. In short, she trifles with the things that keep marriage as it should be, until Keith's interest in another woman an akens her to a consciousness of existing circumstances.

OUTSIDE it was growing dark, and Barbara, suddenly conscious of the time, rose to go. Elise noted with inerest her beauty, and without envy. Barbara was one of the loveliest wome she had ever seen in her life. She had been beautiful at school, but now she was far more developed and far more interesting. Elise wondered what her husband was like and what their life great old rate, when suddenly she was together, and then suddenly, as paused and then exclaimed, "Oh, look Barbara put out her hand to say goodby, there came a sound of quick steps In shape they are like the heavy paper on the stairs, a hurried knock and then as Elise sang "Come in!" a girl appeared in the doorway. She was out of breath and panted a little as she said:

"Hello, Elise," and then, "oh, you hava company, I beg your pardon." It was dusk outside, but it was still light enough for Barbara to see clearly and to stand rooted to the spot for a minute, her breath coming fast, conflict Heat to the boiling point and then ing emotions threatening the breaking down of her self-control

It was Katherine who spoke first. "Isn't this Mrs. Grant?" she said, holdng out her hand.

"And you are Miss Newbery," Barbara returned, putting out her own hand vithout an instant's hesitation. Katherine turned laughingly to Elise who stood staring at them, and it was then that Elise spoke quickly without "So your Mr. Keith Grant is Barbara's husband!" water to the boiling point. The addi-tion of cream sauce will prevent this add two tablespoons of essence to the plain cream sauce, made as follows:

"So your Mr. Keith Grant is Barbara's husband!"

In the easy understanding of Elise's friends this remark would have meant nothing, but falling on Barbara's overwrought nerves it meant a great deal. Barbara was Barbara, however, and she raised her head and met Katherine's eyes fully, a haif smile in her own. Her effort made her feel casier, and Katherine's eyes fully, a haif smile in her own. Her effort made her feel casier, and Katherine did not look like an adventuress.

"You see," Katherine began, "Mr. Grant has done us the honor of coming to some of our Thursday night meetings and we all like him very much, No doubt he has told you about it himself."

Elise's quick brain was working like lightning. She was furlous with herself for making such a tactiess remark and more and more she was understanding the situation. Barbara's impulse was to affreeze up, to answer haughtily, but she Beat to blend thoroughly and then bring to boil and cook slowly for five did nothing of the kind She had to play the game with everything there was in her. She wanted to rush out of the place to get somewhere alone where she could think, but instead she smiled her lovely walks. utes. With this variety of sauces it is possible to serve many attractive dishes. "Katherine has people drop in and everything is discussed, from the ageing world, to the rising prices." Elize laughed, snapping on the electric light. "Must you really go, Barbara! Katherine you'll stay and go to Rosetti's for dinner, won't you?" Arrange a large slice of toast for ach service. Place upon this two small hot boiled potatoes, a generous helping of cooked string beans, a tablespoon of diced carrots, and on top of this lay a slice of fried tomato and cover dinner, won't you?"

Katherine wanted to ask Barbara to one of the Thursday nights, but she felt that such a thing would be impossible that it would not appeal to Barbara at all, and that she would probably refuse anyway. After Barbara had said goodby and had escaped down the stairs to the waiting car, she dropped into a chair facing Elise. This recipe comes from the Creoked Billet Tavern on the London post road. Place a generous helping of well-cooked cabbage, chopped fine, on a slice of toast, then lay around the cabbage Three boiled onions. "Whatever did you say that for?" she

"Whatever did you say that for?" she accused tragically.

"What?" Elise asked easily, getting out a mending basket from the table drawer and proceeding to mend a rip in her gloves. "Oh, that remark about Keith Grant? Well, to tell you the truth it just slipped out. But anyway, Katherine, you have talked a great deal about him, the fact can't be denied. I suppose you thought he was misunderstood at home, and that he had a frivolous empty-headed woman for a wife, didn't you? Well, can you imagine any one tiving with Barbara Grant and not being in love with her cevry minute?"

Katherine regarded Elise with smoldering dark eyes, until finally Elise in biting off a thread looked up and met them with finely chopped parsley and pickled Cook one-half pound of macaroni in boiling water for twenty minutes and was uncomfortably conscious of she had visualized Barbara as heautifully dressed, faultiessly groomed, but entirely lacking in gray matter. It wasn't until that day when Barbara had dropped into the office that Katherine had realized how splendid Keith's wife was. The might be a society girl, but there was no doubt of the fact that she had brains in addition to being not pretty, but heautiful.

(Tomorrow, Barbara begins to wake up)

Nothing can be snore discourteous than a tete-a-tete conversation in a party of three. The old point of the triangle feels slighted, hurt, shut out in the cold.

No matter how absorbed in each other the talkers may be; no matter how in-teresting their duologue, they are guilty of cruel rudeness when they ignore utterly the third member of their party, who, as the illustration shows, is suf-fering from the effect of the selfishness of her companions, and is made to feel, all too conspicuously, that "two are company, three a crowd."

The woman is quite as blamable as the man, since it is easy for her, in a smiling aside, now and then, to include the other girl in the conversation.

How many times have you broken a knifeblade, to say nothing of bending your disposition, when you have had to open one of those preserving jars with the flat glass tops? They certainly are a trial, as you will agree, if you have had any experience with them. And if you have had any experience with them, and if you have had any experience with them, and if you have had any experience with them, and if you have had any experience with them, you will be glad to hear of an opener that has been made for the express purpose of opening them without the slightest trouble or effort. Now I am not mechanically inclined, and it would be totally impossible for me to describe this opener to you. But, after all, we are both more interested in the results, aren't we? And here is what it does—it takes off stubborn glass lids in the twinkle of an eye. And it is a very inexpensive tool, for it costs but twenty-five cents.

He's Bashful

Dear Cynthia—May I ask you this question, "What is the best cure for bashfulness."? I have been troubled with this disease for so long I am beginning to realize that I am being left behind. If wasn't so bashful I would have a score of girl friends. If a girl looks at me straight in the eye, J blush and turn away. This makes the girl have severy stutteringly, so they can't tunderstand what I am saying. The other day I was invited to a party. I was sasigned to a girl. I was so quiet and bashful that I am afraid the girl has lost all hope about me, and I don't blame her. A boy friend of mine suggested that I get half drunk and maybe I could face them this way. Yes, I could do under the girl has lost all hope about me, and I don't blame her. A boy friend of mine suggested that I get half drunk and maybe I could face them this way. Yes, I could do under the girl has lost all hop

Your principal trouble seems to be selfconsciousness. If you would try not to think, "Oh I am going to blush and stutter now," or think, instead, "Goodness, here comes Miss K—; how well she looks today," and then tell her so, you will soon forget about yourself and the bashfulness will go. Try it.

He's Jealous of Her

Dear Cynthia—I am coming to you for more advice. But Cynthia, how is it you never published my last letter? Cynthia, dear, I am a girl in my teens, but in my young teens. About a year ago I met a very nice, young fellow—in fact, he only lived across the way from our home. He used to be very friendly, and take me anywhere I wanted friendly, and take me anywhere I wanted to go, with my mother's permission. But after a few months he moved to another city, and I loved him so much I can never forget him. I never heard from him until a month ago. Since then he has taken me to several places. But when on the street other fellows would speak he would be very jealous and hardly talk. Now Cynthia, last week he heard I was out with another and came and told me I was using him as a "second hand." Cynthia, I love him with all my heart as a brother, but we are both young, and I only want his friendship back again. How can I win it? He is very stubborn not to come again.

His boy friend is also mad at my girl friend.

Your letter was published. You must friendly, and take me anywhere I wanted

Your letter was published. You must have missed an edition of the paper. You are making a mistake, dear, to worry over this jealous boy. He let you alone for several months and yet exalone for several months and yet expects you not to have other friends.

At any rate, you are little more than children and should not be bothering over love matters. Do you and your little friend ever play tennis or take good long walks and runs? You would both be better off if you did, and just let the boys be mad if they want to.

Try a Little Absence

Tweedec—You probably care more than you think. The wisest plan would be to go away for a little while. Can you not plan a visit to another city or to some friend who lives in the country, and manage to be away for a month or two? You will be more apt to find out your true feelings in this man's regard if away for a little while than if you continue seeing him every week and if away for a little while than if you continue seeing him every week and hearing from him every day. Love is a funny thing, you know, and should be treated gently; never play with it, unless some trait you never knew of appears, and you are sure you would not be happy together. Does Not Want Letter Printed Anxious—When a girl wears a man's fraternity pin she is usually supposed to be engaged to him. But it's really a matter for you to decide for yourselves. Generally speaking, there's no reason why you should not.

Why Blondes Attract

Dear Cynthia—I will try to explain to "Cherie" why men are easily attracted to blondes. In the first place, they are not so numerous as brunettes and while many fellows claim that the fair-Maired girl is fickle, a pretty blonde has, and always will be, given her share of popularity. Again, where there are plenty of brunettes a blonde is pleasing.

to the eye and the boys welcome a change of "color." I have noticed this time and time again.

Personally, I'll say blondes are fascinating, though I have been led to believe that most men prefer brunettes. There are many boys who do not trust a light-haired girl. I have never yet been able to win the friendship of a "blonde" myself. It strikes me that the small number of their type makes them all the harder to win, and harder yet to hold, after they have been won. They are, indeed, fickle, being aware of the favor shown them.

If "Cherie" is an attractive brunette, then she need not fear her fair-haired sisters. After all is said and done the boys don't think about a girl's hair when they seek her out; it's her personality and her friendly ways that count every time.

A NY casual observer would have said that it was a very charming group, as the four girls sat down to their bridge table on the porch. They all wore the organdie and voile dresses that make summertime such an attractive season and their conversation was light and full of laughter.

As the conversation simmered down to an absorbed murmur during the arranging of hands and bidding, the casual observer would have smiled in sympathy with their pleasure. He would have thought that the little sigh which Ellen gave as she laid out her dummy hand on the table and picked up her workbag was pure content. He wouldn't have been able to guess anything about the halfbroken heart that sent out that little involuntary sigh.

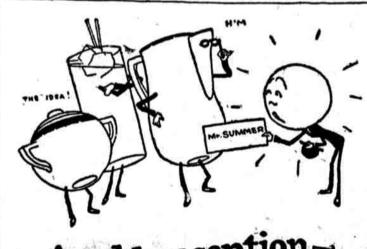

For that light smile of Ellen's didn't come from her heart. It was just a mask to cover the pain that was dying away so very, very slowly. Whenever she picked up that workbag and started to make more French knots on the bathtowel she was marking for a bride-to-be she dropped that smile and the quick
