Nancy Wynne Talks of the Starr-Page Engagement. She Hear's That Miss Wanamaker Is Well Again. Other Items of Interest and Dr. Isaac Starr, Jr. Such a delightful and suitable engagement! I do so like to hear of a union between members of old Philadelphia families like that. Edith Page is, you know, the daughter of the Howard Wurts and Mrs. Howard Wurts and Mrs. Edith Page is, you know, the daughter of the Howard Wurts and Mrs. Harry A. Doctor Starr is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Starr, of Chestnut Hill. His mother was Miss Mary Savage Barclay, and I think that he and Edith are distantly related, for the Barclays and Wisters, and Wurts and Pages and Savages are all connected. No date has been set for the marriage, but, you know lengthy engagements seem to you know, lengthy engagements seem to be out of fashion these days, so I guess it will not be very long before the wedding bells will be ringing.

HEAR that Frances and Elaine I Sullivan have gone up from Long Island, where they have been visiting the Francis Burrall Hoffmans and their small nephew, who is a year old now, to Narragansett Pier. Elaine has developed into an exceedingly pretty girl. She has lovely coloring, and in some ways reminds me of her sister, the late Mrs. Hoffman, though she is a more vivid type than she was.

VOU will be glad to hear, as I was, I that Isabella Wanamaker is home again after three weeks at the hospital. To be sure, she was at the Abington. and as far as hospitals go, that is a delightfully appointed one; but then one s usually pretty sick to have to be there three weeks, and so I am glad she is able to be home once more, for that proves that the operation was a success and that now she is, as the babies say, "all better." She had appendicitis, you know. She went home to Woodroyd this week. Alma, her sister, is up at Lake Mohonk now visiting Mr. and Mrs. Judson Sprankle, but she will return to Merion next week. She is going to spend the month of August at also Camp Iroquois, Lake Winnepesaukee.

NOVELETTE THE DAY OF MEMORIES

THE DAILY

THE day of memories—the saddest, weetest day of all the year—had come. An old man, white and bent, had risen early and now was kneeling or risen early and now was kneeling on the fresh, damp earth among his flowers. In the blossomed apple-tree the little birds had begun their morning song. All

With much care he cut his bower offerings wet with the night's dew. His wife—asleep in the little country churchyard had knelt beside him just a year ago and, with wrinkled hands that trembled and picked the flowers as they fell before his scissors. Twas she who placed them with rare taste and tenderness upon the mounds that marked the final resting place of those who were most dear.

placed them with rare taste and tenderness upon the mounds that marked the final resting place of those who were most dear.

Now they lay upon the ground. He picked them up with hands that trembled, too. Some long-stemmed violets and illies of the valley; her favorites, And then there was his son; the lad who left his young bride to answer his country's call, just as his father, so many years before had gone away to march with Sherman to the sea. Only—only—he had been spared.] The lad wounded on San Juan Hill: They brought him home, but soon—the old eyes filled with tears. It was all so fresh in his mind. The stretcher, the young wife, the baby boy, the days of hope, the days of despair, the longer days of reconciliation.

The widowed mother and her baby, however, had stayed on and filled the old house with sunshine. The little boy, son and grandson of a soldier, was never wear of the lakes of hattle, and in the son and grandson of a soldler, was never weary of the takes of battle, and in the long winter evenings would sit upon the arm of his grandfather's chair and beg arm of his grandfathers come; one more for more.

Then another war had come; one more then another war had come; one more are the come. And for more.

Then another war had come; one more terrible, than any other known. And the call for men—the battle cry—was louder and stronger than his mother's tearful pleadings and his grandparents' broken entreaties.

"Do not ask me to stay behind!" he cried. "Don't make it harder than it is! It's only my duty. It's in the blood!" So he went away, and with him went the sunshine.

His letters were full of hope and tourage and interest. How fine our soldiers were! How splendid were the French—both mer and women! Perhaps, when the war was over and he came back he would bring—well, something to surprise them!

But just before the war was ended, the message came that he had fallen. Somewhere in France. And his mother, the woman who had given so much—a husband and a son—the one who has the hardest part to bear in any war—soon rested beside her soldier lover.

The old man's eyes were blurred with tears. He was so alone; just waiting for "taps." The younger ones had been taken first. Why had he been left?

The picket gate opened and a very little boy ran down the graveled path. A young woman, with hands tensely clasped and lips trembling watched the meeting. The old man looked up. The flowers fell from his hands. A cry escaped his lips.

"My little Davy! My little boy! My—!" He tried to rise. All strength seemed to have left him. In a flash the girl was through the sale and at his side.

"Forgive me sir!" She took his arm to steady him, and with hee hele he art will perform the ceremony and Mr. Montgomery will give his daughter in marriage. "Forgive me, sir." She took his arm to steady him, and with her help he rose to his feet. "I speak not well your language but I understand your heart. Davy—he was my husband. He died for my dear France! He teils me of America and you—the most kind man in all the world. He tells me, if anything happen to him. I bring our little Davy to you. You—you—will let us stay?

was solemnized this morning at the o'clock in the Wakefield Presbyterian Church, Germantown, when Miss Anna Gertrude Field, daughter of Mrs. Jane Field, formerly of Righter street, Wissahickon, and Mr. Thomas Lindberg, of New York, were married by the pastor, the Rev. Hugh B. McCrone. The bride was given in marriage by her brother, Mr. William B. Field, and was unattended. She wore her traveling suit of dark blue taffeta with a duvetyne hat to match and carried orchids and lilles of the valley.

Mr. Lindberg had for best man Mr. Ivan W. Field, also a brother of the bride. Pollowing the quiet ceremony there was a breakfast at the Bellevue-Stratford for the families and a few additional friends, when pond lilles formed the decorations. A wonderful smile broke through the old man's tears. His heart was singing:
"God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform—"

He had been left by divine purpose to welcome this little French war bride and her baby—so like the little Davy or the past—to say "This is your home and I am your protector." God would surely spare him long enough to make good the faith of the soldier who fell in France.

good the faith of the soldier who fell in France.

"They are beautiful! They must not witt!"

He looked down. The girl was picking up the cut flowers, and, with deft fingers, arranging them.

"This is our Memorial Day," he said.

"Every year I take them to our little cemetery. Today I would have gone alone—but for you and Davy," of the little boy. With a beautiful gesture, she touched his arm.

"And but for you, we, also, would have been alone."
