But as fate would have it, just as the sled neared the foot of the hill, a man dashed across its path, intent on catchdashed across its path, intent on caten-ing a street car just slowing down at the next corner. Man and sled reached the spot at the same time. There was a crash as a dozen of eggs struck the icy pavement, and sprawing in undig-nified confusion in the gutter lay John Melbennett.

"What luck!" he muttered. Then, as he faced his assailant, he stammered, I beg your pardon, Miss Goodwin. I

"The fault was all mine," she man-aged to say when she had gained her feet. "I am very sorry. Really, I didn't think there was—you see, the children teased so," she stammered.

By this time McDermott had recovered himself. "I don't generally come this way," he said, "but I had an errant to do today. But I hope you are not hurt, Miss Goodwin. I should never forgive myself."

When she had assured him that she was quite all right, he said he must be getting along toward home.

"Oh, but your package, Mr. McDermott," she called after him.

"That's all right. They are—just eggs," he laughed. "I guess they are broken." A yellow, gozy mass on the pavement confirmed his statement.

Next morning McDermott found on his desk a box containing a dozen of eggs. He hastened to Miss Goodwin's goom for an explanation.

"Well, in order to get them home "you must Well, in order to get them home safely," he said, smiling. "you must promise not to go coasting this afternoon. Instead, would you care to go toboggaring at the park this evening?" So they went that evening and many other evenings. It was between the slides, during the long climb up the hill, that Alice Goodwin and John McDermott got to really know each other. The slide was long and the walk back took some minutes, but they seemed all to short to the boy, these walks under the sliver moon with the snow crunchthe silver moon with the snow crunching under their feet and sparkling like myriads of diamonds; while the girl, in her white swenter and tam and rose-tolored scarf, trudged basids him tolored scarf, trudged ba
