The Marriage Trifler By HAZEL DETO BATCHELOR Copurish, 1910, by Public Ledger Co.

Eleanor Disappears

Barbara Grant did not think much ebout marriage until she began to lose her husband's interest. It was then that she discovered how little thought she had given the partnership she had made, and how seldom she had consulted Keith's plans about anything. She had been content to fit like a butterfly here and there, playing the society game, while Keith wanted the more serious things of life, friends and a wife who was a pal. She discovered that he saw more of his secretary than he did of her, and that Katherine Newbery was not the kind of a girl she had expected all secretaries to be.

BARBARA was up in her room, hunting a cloak, when there came a sharp rap on her door. Almost before she could call "come," the door opened and Leslie's sleek little head appeared.

that Barbara actually pitied her would have been a great surprise if she had known it.

Barbara remembered that evening in a confused kind of a way because of the fact that when they reached Forest Glades Eleanor was not there. In the dressing room Leslie said lightly: "I wonder where Eleanor and Kendall Randall are? I understand that you absolutely disapprove of Kendall, Barbara?" There was a subtly suggested insinuation in her tone that brought the blood to Barbara's face in a rush of anger.

"Of course I don't like him, not for Eleanor," she said quickly. "He's much too old for her, and he's dissipated a But he's rich," Leslie suggested,

slyly.

Barbara turned to her quickly.

"Oh, Leslie, don't be so sordid."

This June afternoon, however, Ted was not farming. Just after dinner he took a bath and donned his "city" clothes. When he walked into the kitchen, straw hat in hand, his mother appraised him with an expression of proud admiration.

"Dear me, Ted." she toked "it's no."

"Dear me. Ted," she joked, "it's no wonder Ruth likes Woodfield. I certain-ly admire her taste," "Aw cut it out, ma. Say, ma, do you like this tie?" Of course she did. And if ma did, then Ruth surely would.

Perpetually wavy or curly hair is now within the means of every wom-an to possess. When this dries the most beautiful and natural looking waves and creases imaginable are in evidence. Wind and heat do not affect the curliness as where a heated fron has been used.

Liquid slimerine is so pure and harmless there is not the slightest dancer of spotting the scalp or streaking the hair, and it leaves no sticky or greasy trace. It will also be appreciated as a beneficial dressing, as it keeps the hair so soft, silky and lustrous.—Adv.

Toddie Pupkins kept a wary eye on Lonesome Bear, but his barks began to come slower. He broke out again and again in little explosions that gradually died away. Finally his growl turned into a chuckle and his snari gave way to a grin—the broadest and friendliest kind of a grin. Soon he was laughing as hard as Peggy and Billy and almost as hard

"Bow-wow-wow! You don't look like a bad old bear when you're laughing." repiled Toddle Pupkins. "Maybe if you'll stay good I'll not eat you up."
That tickled Lonesome Bear and he burst into another gale of laughter.
"Waw-ugh, hear the mighty puppy! He has decided not to eat me up! I thank you, kind sir," roared Lonesome Bear.

with his laughing, he sat down and looked Toddle Pupkins over very carefully.

"You're a plucky youngster. I rather like you, even though you did turn me out of my fine cave," he growled in a friendly sort of a way.

"And you're a folly old bear when you're not cross," answered Toddie Pupkins, sitting down and facing Lonesome Bear. "If you'll promise to be good, I might let you live to the corner of the cave. It's pretty big for just me."

"Waw-ugh! That's a bargain. I'm sure I'd never get lonely with such an amusing puppy around," grinned Lonesome Bear.

So Toddle Pupkins and Lonesome Bear became friends and roommates instead of foes. Peggy and Billy were very glad—for it was a much happier way to have things turn out than if Lonesome Bear had thrashed and smashed the plucky puppy.

Lonesome Bear climbed down the bluff right away to move into the cave, and
