"Hants—must be," Adele laughed offily. "Oh the mystery. We'll watch soffily. "Oh the mystery. We'll watch see what we'll see."

All was as usual about the house as ward went back and forth to his work the following day, as also when Adele deep walked down purposely to stee what they could see, the gleam of light was once more visible. Adele, marry bursting with curiosity, imagined sery possible solution of the "mystery." saly seconded by her husband.

Three days passed. Still no signs of life about the place by daylight but the steady light far into the night, as Adele send Ward took pains to ascertain. That third evening Adele reached the limit of sulvance.

"Its our house!" she said. "We've adopted it even if it does belong to some one else. I won't have burglars and thieves and—and maybe smallpox patients desecrating that nice dining-room—life it is the dining-room. Come. Ward, we'll go very softly, but we'll have a peek under the window shade if it's the last act of our young lives."

Ward hesitated and looked up and sown the street. All was quiet—not a soul in sight. Curiosity is not a trait belonging exclusively to women. Adele was tip-toeing up the walk and he followed her around into the shadow of the syringa bush, then close to the wall until they reached the window where the baffling light was.

A place where light may shine does not necessarily mean an opening large sough to look within, as Ward and Adele soon found. A tiny glimpse of polished window-sill was all that rewarded their efforts.

Not to be discouraged. Adele started en, motloning Ward to follow. Around the corner of the house she led the way to a back window where the immates had evidently used less care. A good two inches of space remained below the drawn shade. Crouching low gain he threw them down before him, jumped up and resumed his walk. "Crazy!" whispered Adele in Ward's a ma-chine," returned Ward, last part of the word was drawn t in an unexpected and explosive soul in an unexpected and explosive smeere, hissing loudly out in the silence. In an instant the shade was raised. The lower sash went up before they could turn away and the glaring eyes of the man inside met theirs. Then he as out through the open window.

"March on through the back door or il call the police." he said gruffly.
Like two guilty children they steped through the doorway and into the ghted room. Then surprise and emarassment on Ward's part turned to stonishment.

tonishment.
"Mr. Wentworth!" he exclaimed.

Stonishment.

"Mr. Wentworth!" he exclaimed.
"Young Preston! Head of our drafting room, upon my word!" The older man sat down helplessly.

Then followed hasty explanations on both sides. Adele, listening to the two men, had hard work to grasp the situation. Mr. Wentworth must be the Mr. Wentworth where Ward worked. And his machine was one he was perfecting and would put the firm ahead of its competitors. These competitors. Mr. Wentworth was explaining, were hard after the idea—actually spying to get held of it. Taking a house secretly seemed to be the only way to keep clear of them—in the shop even some of the regular men might not be loyal—here he stopped and looked sharply at Ward. But Ward was not paying attention. He was fingering parts of the machine. In the office he had seen to drawing up all the small pieces, but he knew nothing of the assembled machine. In a moment the two men had their heads together and were bending intently forward.

Adele slipped quietly away to explore the house that was hers and ver poor Adele slipped quietly away to explore the house that was hers and yet not hers. When she came back, the scene had changed. A motor was busily working and the connected machine was whiring smoothly. Mr. Wentworth was putting on his coat, his face beaming with satisfaction.

"Well, Mrs. Preston," he said, "this burgiar' business is a lucky thing for me. That husband of yours has managed to dig up the very idea that is the keynote to the whole combination. We will have put it over the other fellow this time all right."

Adele, breathless with excitement, proud of her husband, could think of no word to say.

"Now, as I understand it." Mr. Wentworth went on, "you were just ready to buy this house when I got it. Well, I don't see but it has done its work as far as I am concerned. Now, if you still want it, I think I can afford to discount a bit on the price, and the terms will be easy.

Tomorrow's complete novelette, "Re-naissance"

Adventures With a Purse I love a cool, inviting porch, with lew hanging striped awnings in green and white, and deep, comfortable chairs. And I like to see things about the porch as if it were really lived on in summer. Books, for instance, should be about on a low table. in summer. Books, for instance, should be about on a low table, and perhaps a workbasket, and maybe even a box of candy or some fruit. Then, of course, there should be plants. What porch could possibly hope to be complete without some plants! And while there is no particular reason, I suppose, why the plants should not be "parked" in the regulation red pots, there are, on the other hand, any number of reasons why they should be housed in something infinitely more attractive—as are the basket jardinieres one shop a making a specialty of. The baskets are low, round affairs, and they come painted in old rose, in tan, or in blue, and are decorated with hand-painted owers. They are mighty artistic and, as matter of fact, would make very alce looking wastebaskets. The prices begin as low as $1.75.

As I have made mention before, if
