

The Unwelcome Wife

By HAZEL DEVO BACHELOR

Anthony Harriman persuades Charlotte Graves, a little country girl, to marry him secretly. He leaves her behind and goes back to the city to break the news to his people, who are furious because he has married beneath his rank. His mother, however, is too clever not to accept Charlotte and take the girl under her wing, and Anthony goes back to the farm to bring his wife home with him.

Mother and Daughter

THE door was opened to Tony and his wife by Fitch, the old butler. His face was wreathed with smiles as he said the door wide for them. Something in Charlotte's wide blue eyes had won his impressionable old heart in a moment.

"Your mother is upstairs in her sitting room," Fitch said in a low voice to Tony. "Will you go right up?"

And Charlotte, still with that attitude of moving in a dream, Tony up the stairs. Fitch carried the straw suitcase. They went along a hall richly carpeted to a room at the farther end. Anthony opened the door and pushed Charlotte in ahead of him. She was conscious of a room with comfortable chairs, and a woman with very dark hair seated on a low couch before an open fire. There was a scent of roses in the room, and the two large windows were draped with rose cretonne over fine lace. The woman looked up from the book she was reading, and rose slowly.

"Well, Tony," she said smoothly, and held out her hand. "This is Charlotte," he said quickly stepping aside, so that the two women were alone. "Ah," said Mrs. Harriman still in that smooth voice. "How do you do, my dear?"

She held out a hand, a slim, perfectly groomed hand, on which several jewels gleamed and sparkled. Tony and Charlotte looked at her with interest. Charlotte's own hand, hard and work-worn, but tender nevertheless. A little sob rose in the girl's heart, a homesick little feeling of utter wretchedness. And so this is Charlotte, Mrs. Harriman was saying. She did not kiss her new daughter, but she let her keen eyes run quickly over the pathetic little figure in its cheap store clothes. There was no mistaking the fact that she had no intention of taking Charlotte to her heart.

"Would you like to go to your room, or will you have tea first?" she asked smoothly. Charlotte felt that she could not bear those eyes another moment. She must be alone with Tony for only a minute of reassurance. She looked at her husband intently, and with a smile Mrs. Harriman interpreted that look.

"Thank you, mother," said Tony briefly. He saw that his mother did not intend to make things easy for him, and, criticism forgotten, all of his sympathy was with Charlotte. He put a kindly hand on her arm and led her like a child out of the room. They went up the flight of stairs, down another hallway, and then Tony threw open the door of the loveliest room Charlotte had ever seen. The floor was white, two little beds side by side with puffy silk comfortables spread over the foot of each, a dressing table with a triple mirror, a writing desk, and a lowboy with a mirror hung above it for Tony. There was a big, upholstered chair and several other low comfortable chairs. Through the door could be glimpsed a gleaming white bathroom shining with soap, and with a polished tiled floor. A little dressing room, hardly more than an alcove opened out of the room on the other side. Charlotte, forgetful of the coldness of her welcome, exclaimed like a child at this airiness. She ran over her feet, one thing to another, until inconspicuously she caught a glimpse of herself full length in the mirror that was inserted into the door. Then she gasped, and her eyes widened in that way they had.

"Oh, Tony," she exclaimed in agony of grief. "There's something wrong with me! I don't fit in here at all!"

WHAT'S WHAT

By HELEN DECIE

Walking is the most beautiful of all exercises, and our glorious Indian summer weather is ideal for "hiking" parties. But the walkers ought to be suitably attired; especially should they be suitably shod. The young woman delineated is obliged to cut short a pleasant autumnal ramble because with her correct tailored costume she is wearing shoes neither correct nor comfortable—slippers with French heels designed for a ballroom wear, but worse than useless for a pedestrian.

Not all women can wear flat heels. It is true, for the high-arched foot requires a shoe to correspond. A sensible compromise in that case is the Cuban or military heel, which, though fairly high, is straight, and properly placed beneath the natural heel of the foot.

New Silver for Old

Tucked away in an attractive upstairs office of the Fine Arts Building, in Chicago, is the business home of Miss Cleo, enola C. Conroy, who has achieved a very remarkable success in the short space of half a dozen years, through the odd medium of transforming old silver into new.

"It was about six years ago," Miss Conroy says, in discussing the manner in which the idea for her business came to her, "that I had a chum, a young man who was greatly interested in the work of making jewelry. I was going to the Art Institute at the time, taking lessons in art and designing. I became in-

Today's Inquiries

- 1. Who is Miss Lena Ratcliffe, of Baltimore?
2. Describe a dainty little pair of booties for the new baby.
3. When it is desired to use an electric iron in the bedroom, what emergency "board" makes a soft, smooth surface for pressing?
4. How can a decoration for ice cream at a party be made?
5. What is the newest place for the bow of a sash?
6. How can a plain flowered ribbon be given a broad effect for a sash or hat trimming?

"For a time I experimented with my designs, working them out slowly and taking my lessons in between times. Little by little, I mastered the intricacies of the work and finally I abandoned my 'art career' entirely, preferring to devote my time exclusively to the designing of unusual silver jewelry. We didn't have many customers at first, but each of them told other people about us and, at the end of three years, we had built up a good solid foundation. People brought their old silver to us and we remodeled it into any one of a number of things—a ring or a bracelet or a necklace. The work isn't hard and it provides good scope for one's imagination. What's even better, however, is the fact that it enables one to be financially independent—which is what many women are striving for these days."
