law who so patently interested hernell in and controlled the activities of her son.

"yes." ratited on Mrs. Bulmer, 'his employers have at last realized the absolute necessity of a vacation for himbefore he has a nervous breakdown, you know—and I'm completing arrangements now for him to spend the two weeks at a nice quiet farm back in the mountains. There's a hammock in the picture and tream and egga overy morning. It will be very restful for the poor boy."

Alicia opened her mouth, then closed it on a bit of the cake. Time enough aftershe was married to argue the merits of golf, tennis and a medicine bag versus fanimocks and carbohydrates in the case of George. But she shuddered inwardly as she visualized her possibly future husband at the end of his holiday.

Meanwhile, down in the office, George's business associates openly amnounced their envy. 'Oh, boy—think of it! October' The ideal season for hikes, mountain climbing, canoeing! Which is it to be, old sport—the Maine woods, or the Adirondacks, or the wilds of Muskoka?"

"Why, I bellevb—wait, let me soe!" George reached into an inner pocket and extracted a railroad folder. "Here we are—'Northern Massachusetts—'The wellows'—Mrs. Henty Beatson—Pride's Croising, Nice, homelike surroundings, Wholesome food from our own garden. No mosquitots.' Sounds fine, doesn't it?' And George spoke with enthusiasm.

"Mn—m." said Harry Taylor, "Nice about the mosquitoes."

Be that as it may, several days later

"Uh-huh," said Harry Taylor, "Nice about the mosquitose."

Be that as it may, several days later brought George Bulmer and his straw sutcase into Mrs. Beatson's parlor and the presence of Thespia, Mrs. Beatson's parlor and the presence of Thespia, Mrs. Beatson's only daughter, who excellently advertised both the healthfulness of "The Willows" and the standard of pulchitude of Pride's Crossing, And Thespia, fed up with more or less perpetual farm hands, annually recurring schoolmarms, and occasional drummers, reached out for George and, without his being aware of it, marked him for her owns.

That evening George, after one wistful glance at the hammock, in whose languerous depths his mother was fondly picturing him, permitted the scheming daughter of the house to beat him seven games running at croquet. And, as a consequence, the one farmhand decided no longer to be perpetual the had long cast eyes at Thespia) and took his leave the next-morning. And, as a further consequence, Mr. Henry Beatson, swinging an are too vigorously in an endeavor to get through and attend to the milking not done by the departing farmhand, badly cut his foot and laid himself up for a spell.

"I am so glad to think of you as getprell.

I am so glad to think of you as getting a good rest, dear. MOTHER."

The letter, of which this was the concluding sentence, reached George the fixth day of his absence, and it found him collarless, coatless, mopping his browns he reated his back and his fork and his fork and his fork.

Back in the office, the boys, and even fiers, congratulated George on his improved appearance.

"Place did you good," commented leet.

How'd you kill two weeks, anyhow?"

asked Harry.
"Sor, of a stunt, at that," said George without a smile. "Wore out one croquet mallet, persuaded one girl to love only me forever, and dug forty-seven bushels of potatoes."

A Quiet Vacation for George Organ plays at 9, 11 and 4:50 A Quiet Vacation for George

By J. STUART LANE

"Yes." Mrs. Bulmer sighed heavily as she poured a second cup of tea for Alicia. "poor George is dreadfully overworked this fall. You know how it is when a man is easy-going. Everything is just piled on to him.

Alicla, mentally summoning the image of George Bulmer, roundfaced, rosy-cheeked, lipping the scales at 180 or more, tried in vain to visualize him as averworked. But she nodded assentingly to the assertions of her hostess. After all, for some time now she had been considering this same George as a matrimental possibility (if only he weren't quite so cherubic!) and she had no desire to antagonize a future mother-inlaw who so patently interested herself in and controlled the activities of her son.

"Yes." rattled on Mrs. Bulmer, "his
