

"DOPE" SMUGGLER ENDS LIFE ON SHIP

Man Who Brought Drugs Here Feared Detectives at New York Port

SEEK AGENTS IN THIS CITY

Manuel Garcia Gayon, who frequently smuggled drugs into Philadelphia, killed himself aboard the steamship Atlantic Sun in New York harbor yesterday because he feared discovery.

The reason for his act, he wrote, "could be found underneath my bunk." When authorities investigated they found he had hidden 240 bottles of cocaine there.

Members of the crew said Gayon told them he frequently had smuggled drugs past the customs officials at this port, but it was his first attempt in New York, and he feared discovery there.

SPHINX IS HOST TO POOR RICHARD

New York Advertising Club Entertains Philadelphia Organization Royally

OCCASION NOT SOLEMN

Members of the Poor Richard Club on a mass descent on New York last night and after seeing the sights ended up as guests of the Sphinx Club at a banquet given especially in their honor.

Poor Richard certainly put itself on the map. The praises of this city's products, which members of the advertising men's club represent, were sung at the feast, and when the Philadelphia delegation left, the New Yorkers, the Poor Richards say, knew a whole lot more about this city and its products than they did before the advent of the Philadelphia "live wires."

It was not a solemn occasion. Serious remarks were banned, unless punctuated by levity at intervals of three minutes at the longest. And R. P. R. Huntsman, president of the Sphinx, had at his left hand a traffic signal which insured against violation of the rule.

Philip Kind, as chairman of Poor Richard's entertainment committee, brought with him seven Philadelphia girls who sang of Stetson hats, Girard cigars, Burpee seeds, victrolas, Notazene, Felix naphtha and Fenton labels.
