

DREAMLAND ADVENTURES

Moonlight Glee By DADDY

CHAPTER V Uninvited Guests

AFTER Judge Owl had gobbled up the leader of the Field Mice orchestra, the Rabbits' Moonlight Glee ball went on merrier than ever.

Peggy liked Hoppy-Hop as a partner, and he seemed to like her, for he was selfish in trading dances with the other rabbits. All the rabbits danced the same kind of a dance, which they called the bunny bob. The dance was like its name—a bobbing, hopping dance that was a lot of fun.

"Why don't you dance fox trots, too?" asked Peggy of Hoppy-Hop. He winked up his whiskers and smiled as he answered:

"Fox trots? No indeed. Rabbits don't like foxes nor fox trots. They trot after us too often."

Judge Owl wiped off his mouth carefully after he had finished luncheon on the orchestra leader. Then spread his wings to fly away on his rounds as head watchman of Birdland.

"Whoop! Whoop! When you get through with that orchestra stand for me, please!" hooted. "This night work watching Birdland makes me hungry and I'm ready for a great big dinner at dawn."

The field mice in the hall knew what he meant by that and they squeaked and scolded about the old owl at the party with Peggy. Judge Owl went to scold Toodle for making so much noise while "kitty" lay.

The rabbits felt more free to dance when Judge Owl was gone, just as children playing in the streets are more free after a policeman has passed along. But they wouldn't have felt so glad over his going if they had known that he was going to tell Toodle Pupkins that Hoppy-Hop was at the ball instead of in the woods.

The mean foxes were rats—big, gray farm rats. They had crept out of the barns at a moonlit night on the piles of yellow corn which the huskars had left in the fields. On their way to the corn the rats had heard the sound of the field-mice music and they had sneaked up to the self-putting green to see what it was all about.

When the rats saw the party they wanted to get into it. They wanted to dance and they wanted to feast. "Giggly-giggly-gee!" whispered Frowzy Whiskers, the chief of the rats. "Giggly-giggly-gee!" Here is moonlight-gee! Meat tastes better than corn to me. We will dance with rabbits merrily, for we will dine on them heartily. Giggly-giggly-gee!"

The rats liked that idea. Silently they crept forward, slowly they formed a circle around the dancing rabbits. Then Frowzy Whiskers squeaked loudly and the rats jumped forward for a feast.

My, but the rabbits were startled. They quit their dance with shrieks of fright and huddled in the center of the green. Hoppy-Hop swung Peggy to the very middle of the group, and stood in front of her to guard her.

Peggy was as much startled and as much scared as the rabbits. She was afraid of rats as well as mice even when they were as small as the rabbits, and the rats looked to her as large as lions.

"Giggly-giggly-gee! Come dance with us," sneered Frowzy Whiskers. "Every rat take a partner, and I'll take that doll in the center. He looked right at Peggy as he crept forward. Peggy shuddered and gave a cry of fear.

As if in answer to her cry, there came a yell from the woods. "Ki-yi! Ki-yi! Ki-yi!" It was Toodle Pupkins. "I was coming keen for revenge on Hoppy-Hop, but he stopped short when he saw the chief of the rats around the rabbits. 'Save us, Toodle,' cried Peggy. 'Rats,' he roared. 'Toodle bravely. 'But you can bet I'll save you.' But what happened then will have to wait for the next chapter.

POLICE NAB LIQUOR TRUCK

Seize $8000 in Whisky and Make Two Arrests

Police scored another victory in the fight against "whisky runners" last night when they seized a truck loaded with $8000 worth of liquor and arrested two men in charge of the consignment.

It was shortly before midnight when the police of the Twentieth and Berks streets station received an anonymous telephone call that a whisky-laden truck was standing at Eighteenth street and Montgomery avenue. Patrolman Bowen jumped on the truck as it was about to be driven away, and after a two-minute fight with the chauffeur, the patrolman dragged him from his seat.

As he was leading the man to the station house another man drove up in a touring car and remonstrated with the officer for interfering with the movements of the truck. He, too, was arrested. The man who interfered, the police say, is the owner of the consignment. He gave his name as Samuel Weinstein, of 811 South Eleventh street.

The driver of the truck was Frank Clever, of 745 Kater street. Both were turned over to the federal prohibition enforcement agents.

MAYOR TO MEET WOMEN

Moore Calls Conference for Support of Administration

Mayor Moore arranged with leaders of women's organizations in this city yesterday for a conference in his office in City Hall, December 2, at which plans for actively supporting the municipal government will be worked out.

Mrs. George A. Dunning, chairman of the Philadelphia League of Women Voters, with headquarters at 133 South Twelfth street, suggested the conference, and the Mayor agreed immediately and fixed the date. He declared that while the sessions would commence at 10 a. m., it might continue during the afternoon and promised to give "concrete information" as to the city administration. Directors of all the city departments will attend the conference.

The Mayor conferred with Mrs. Dunning and Miss Maude Burt McCull, chairman of the Thirty-fourth ward branch of the League of Women Voters, during the afternoon. Mrs. Dunning said that the purpose of the conference was to learn in what way women can be of intelligent assistance to the various departments.

BAN PENN SCALPERS

Two Lower Classes Promise to Aid Athletic Association

The two lower classes of the University of Pennsylvania have decided to break up "scalping," which is causing so much trouble to the Penn athletic authorities. At a joint meeting held in the Houston Club, the sophomore and freshman classes went on record as willing to stop ticket speculation by any means necessary.

Last Saturday a strong-arm squad ran several scalpers off the campus and asked people to boycott them. This method was successful and there were many vacant seats at the Penn-Pitt game. The demand for tickets for the Dartmouth game has been so heavy that the Athletic Association office will not be able to supply the late-comers.
