THAT promenade up at the Metropolitan used certainly to give me "the of the box throng. Somehow it did not seem to be the thing to have just one exclusive little walk for the boxholders and to compel others who had paid perfectly good money for their seats to walk upstairs a flight higher and standand gaze down upon the boxholders and their guests, much as if they were caged wonders.

No, the Academy while plenty exclusive enough for those who wish to be exclusive, is also big enough to allow scatholders to walk in its promenade. And to say the least, the lighting in that foyer gives the most becoming glow I have ever seen. And how very well every one looked! They actually did look well, but I found that wonderful glow of light, which has been arranged in the rejuvepased fover, was of great

WELL, wasn't it brilliant in every way last night? Wonderful performance, wonderful audience, wonderful promenade! I would certainly have hated to miss that sight. Of course, one does miss the beauty of the grand tier, because the brilliant gowns and jewels stood out so in those boxes, and the boxes are in a way lost in the parquet circle; but, on the other hand, every one is closer together and the general appearance of the whole audience is perhaps more festive and dressy.

The cutting of the apron off the stage has certainly taken nothing from it and has added much to the space in the opera house itself.
