a way as to indicate that the thief had rested his weight heavily upon it.

It must have been a peculiarly mutilated hand that made that mark, else—the second finger had been held away from the table to make it look as though the hand were mutilated. This could be done, Harvey Hunt knew, by slipping something, a pencil, for instance, under the second finger and across the tops of the other fingers. This would naturally give the hand a slightly cupped shape even when the full weight was borne upon it.

Besides, why was one hand dirty and the other clean, as Harvey Hunt found by an inspection of the window sash? Undoubtedly because one hand purposely had been dirtied to leave the missing Undoubtedly because one hand purposely had been dirtied to leave the missing finger impriot as a false trail. And the hand had been dirtied in coal dust. Clearly, it was an inside job, conceived on the spur of the moment and made to look like an outside one by raising the window. Everything pointed to the butlef as the person who had the opportunity of seeing Mackon place the money in the drawer without attracting attention to himself, as the person who was supplied with cotton gloves, evidently several pairs of them, who had access to the coal bin, and who could have entered the library without causing sustered the library without causing sus-picion even if he had been seen.

THEY found Bill Charleroi's body in the forest. Charleroi had been murdered. Suspicion at once centered on Pete Barkell and Ira Plumworthy, who had started out with him on the fatal hunting trip. But there were no clues upon the ground that either the district attorney or Harvey Hunt, both of whom were in the search party, could find to incriminate them. Beyond the fact that the man's skull and been crushed by a heavy blunt instrument, probably but not certainly the butt of a riffe, that he had been struck from behind and had dropped in his tracks without a struggle, there was nothing to indicate how the crime had been committed. Any marks that had been left by the camp fire had been swept away by the heavy rains of the past few days. the forest. Charleroi had been
