Two More Books That Make Moorfield Storey and Others Discuss Capitalism, Socialism and Other Subjects

The amount of press-agenting which the South Seas have had within the last two years or so must make the leading ladies of the theatre envious. Somerset Maugham turned popular attention to the Tahiti by his "The Moon and Sixpence." in which the experiences of an artist in that detectable isle were described. The discovery that the original of the artist was Gauguin, an error of the Prench painter, was followed by the translation into English of his book form.

Moorfield Storey, diplomatist and publicist, has collected in book form under the general title of "Problems of Today" his E. L. Godkin lectures delivered at Harvard last mouth. The Codkin Foundation, on which many important lectures have been delivered, was established in 1903 by friends of the late distinguished editor of The Nation, with the purpose of making available to students the views of notation. the translation into English of his book ble thinkers and doers on the about the island and its life and about subject of "The Essentials of his own experiences. Then came Fred-eick O'Brien's book, hailed by Mrs. Zen." Mr. Storey has contributed aderick O'Brien's book, hailed by Mrs.

Jack London as the very quintessence of the essential spirit of the region, and so entertaining that it has gone into three or four editions.

How many other books about the islands have been issued only a bibliographer can tell. Two new ones, however, have appeared within a few weeks.
