

DREAMLAND ADVENTURES
"The Magic Artist"
 By DADDY

CHAPTER II
The Queer White Rabbits

The Giant of the Woods took such great strides with his long legs that he came quickly to Birdland, where he intended to hunt for rabbits. He drew Peggy behind him on her sled as though she weighed no more than a fairy. Toddie Pupkins had to run his very hardest to keep up with them.

"You'd better stay safely behind a tree while I hunt the rabbits," said the giant to Peggy, as they entered the forest.

"Nay, you forget that I came to warn the rabbits to flee from your bullets," answered Peggy.

"Ho! Ho! Ho! This is a queer way to go hunting," laughed the giant. "But the rabbits can't run fast enough to get away from my bullets, so leave your sled here and warn them all you want to."

"Wool! Wool! I'm a good hunting dog but I can't smell any rabbit tracks here," sniffed Toddie Pupkins, nosing around in the snow. "But I smell Billy Belgium's tracks. Perhaps we shall learn what secret errand brought him to the woods so early this morning. Wool! Wool!"

Suddenly Peggy's sharp eyes saw a rabbit's fuzzy ears peep above a low bush. If the Giant of the Woods saw that rabbit he would surely shoot. Quick as a wink, Peggy turned her back on the rabbit and looked the other way. At the same time she screamed a warning:

"Run, rabbit! Run for your life! The Giant of the Woods is hunting you with a big gun!"

The giant whirled around and looked the way Peggy was looking, which, of course, was exactly the wrong way to look to see the rabbit.

"Where is it?" roared the giant, lifting his gun.

"Ki-yi! Here it is! Ki-yi!" yelled Toddie Pupkins behind him. The giant glanced around just in time to see Hoppity-Hop waving good-by with his stubby tail as he dove safely down his hole. Peggy's warning had been just in time to save Hoppity-Hop.

"Ho! Ho! I told you I'd shoot a rabbit to get you a rabbit skin to wrap your chilly babies in!" roared the giant, running forward to pick up the rabbit. But there was no rabbit nor rabbit's skin beside the stump—nothing at all except little lumps of snow.

"Geewhillekers! Where could that rabbit have gone to?" roared the Giant of the Woods. Toddie Pupkins was sniffing around the stump.

"Sniff! Sniff! I thought I saw a rabbit here, but my nose tells me no rabbit has been here. There are no rabbit tracks and no rabbit smells, but I can see Billy's tracks and I can smell Billy's scent."

Peggy, glancing around trying to see where the rabbit had gone, happened to look up in a tree and there perched on a limb was the same white rabbit or another white rabbit—she couldn't tell which. She was astonished to see a rabbit up a tree, and let out a scream: "Run, rabbit!"

The Giant of the Woods saw the rabbit at the same instant. Bang! Bang! went his gun. Down dropped something to the ground.

"Ho! Ho! Now we'll get that rabbit skin!" shouted the giant, running to the tree. But no rabbit skin was there—only more broken bits of snow.

"Geewhillekers! What kind of a rabbit is that?" roared the giant. "Is it a magic rabbit, or is it a ghost rabbit?"

Toddie Pupkins was sniffing around the tree as he had sniffed around the stump.

"Sniff! Sniff! No rabbit is here and my nose tells me no rabbit has been here. But my eyes see Billy's tracks and my nose tells me Billy has been this way. Sniff! Sniff!"

Do you think the rabbits were magic rabbits or ghost rabbits. Do you think Toddie Pupkins was right when he said no rabbit had been there, but Billy had? Do you think you will find out in the next chapter?

Arts Fellowship Holds Reception

Things You'll Love to Make

Cushion for Child's Room

Attractive cushions add charm to a child's play or sleeping room. To make this out-of-the-ordinary cushion, cover a small oblong pillow with black linen on the top, and red on the bottom. Select a brightly-colored nursery picture. (The one used was Red Riding Hood.) Paste it to the top of the covered cushion, and give it a coat of clear shellac. Stitch a piece of braid around the picture. Several such cushions, though costing little, will add much to the interest and joy of a playroom. One of your tiny friends would be delighted to receive this cushion as a Christmas gift.
