Two Minutes of Optimism By HERMAN J. STICH

IF YOU WERE LEFT A MILLION

F COURSE, you think it impossible, and perhaps a foolish waste of valuable line to even think of it, though strenger things have happened, yet-If somebody left you a million dollars, what would you do?

Get up a beautiful speech telling the boss exactly where he got off? Hire a couple of roughnecks to polish properly the persons against whom have been nursing a special grudge? Give a series of "blowouts," maybe, to the "boys" and the "girls," sink a sall fortune in a yacht and a few automobiles, do the town red or brown to a Would you do what Charles Garland, of Boston, did the other day when se learned he was entitled to his share of his father's large estate—a cool, round Though he has a wife and infant daughter to support, he says both his wife and he prefer living on what he can earn to a life of uncarned luxury, leisure What the baby daughter will opine when she is old enough to think for herelf is a matter open to speculation; but if we are to judge by what the rest the family has done, there may not be such a serious clash of conclusions

For this indifference toward the "root of all evil" seems to flow in the blood of the Garland strain. Some years ago Charles Garland's mother, by marrying the man she loved, forfeited her claim to the Garland millions. And his brother James, who also is entitled to a million, is planning to ome an automobile mechanic. The Garlands will simply have none of it!

'Money is the cause of unrest and unfiappiness," declares Mother Garland. "I didn't do anything to earn the money," says Charles. "I believe that declining to take it I am placing my life upon a Christian basis." "So much money would just sap the meaning and the joy from life," is James' idea. "I prefer to go to work."

There you have them-the three Garlands-their contempt for the "filthy e"-and what, no matter which way you look at it, is more important, their ral strength, backbone and courage of conviction.

Most of us will think, and justifiably, that this renunciation of a million dollars, and with it the wonderful opportunity to do untold good is eccentric or Perhaps some of us feel about money the same as the Garlands do-but if omebody left us a million-we hesitate to mention the proportion of instances in which it would be a case of "Do as I think, don't do as I do!" That is one reason why, approve or disapprove as we may of their course of action, everybody's hat goes off to them-mother and sons-for they have done what most of us could not or would not do. What 909 peple out of 1000 who share their views merely believe in-they acted. They could have had everything, but because they did not earn it they will accept nothing.

There is one other thought this incident brings to mind: If foremen, office managers, executives and others who have people working "under" them made this idea one of their guiding principles—that is, if they refused to accept encomiums to which they are not entitled and insisted upon riving credit where credit is due, it would develop that a good many of the great nventions, scientific discoveries, money-making ideas and general improvements that have advanced industry, the professions and sciences emanated from the brains of "underdogs" and unknowns fighting the great uphill fight for recog-

There would be more widespread contentment and satisfaction if there were less inferior "superiors." tions of the voices of the people about her. She remembered everything they said, as well as the way in which they said it, and she would frequently convulse her family by her imitations of friends and relatives. When she was about fifteen she attended her first play and, after seeing it only once, was able to repeat practically all the lines, verbatim. The next week she repeated the feat by appearing before a woman's club in her home town and gave her impression of the actors and what they said. Her success was so immediate that, when it came to a question of how she was to make her way in the world, the answer lay clearly before her—she would transplant plays to sections of the country where New York casts seldom appear.

Miss MacLaren went to the metropolis

CHAPTER II

The Dancing Kitchen Mald UDGE OWL decided the quickest way

JUDGE OWL decided the quickest way he could get to the home of Marigold, the dancing kitchen maid, was by riding with Peggy and Billy on Billy's salising sed. So he crowded down behind Peggy, while Billy pushed the sled out of the bush in which it had stopped. The wintry wind caught the sail and sent the sled spinning over the snow's icy crust.

"Whoo! Whoo! Too! Too!" screeched Judge Owl in alarm. "Whoo! Whoo! This is faster than I like to go. We will hit some one and smash them to bits!"

"We will not hit any one while you screech that way," chuckled Billy. "Keep on screeching! You make a fine whistle to scare folks out of our path."

"Whoo! Whoo! We are flying so swiftly we will fir yearned Judge Owl. "She lives in a fine big country house with trees all around it."

By the time they were speeding over broad fields, and, sure enough, not far broad fields. The first way in the way in the way in the world, the ancient way in the way in the world, the ancient way in the way in the world transplant plays to sections of the country where New York casts seldom appear.

Miss MacLaren went to the metropolis and found that it would be easy to make the necessary financial arrangements with the authors and managers of the season's most successful plays. She attended each one three times and found that it would be easy to make the necessary financial arrangements with the authors and managers of the cast from far flower in white an

By this time they were speeding over broad fields, and, sure enough, not far away was a large country house with trees a l around it. Bill steered the sled up to the broad driveway and would have stopped the sied at the front door had not Judge Owl hooted for him to go around the back way.

"Whoo! Whoo! Marigold, the dancing kitchen maid lives in the kitchen!" said Judge Owl. So Billy steered around to the back door. "C.Imb to the window and you can see Marigold, the dancing kitchen maid," mumb ed Judge Owl. Peggy and Billy did as he said, climbing upon a box that stood outside the window, while Judge Owl perched on the branch of a tree. Within the kitchen was a girl just finishing the washing of the dinner dishes. The girl was sweet of face, but her clothes were old and worn. She looked very poor.

As the girl carried the dishes to the cupboard, she danced lightly and gracefully to the tune of a little song she hummed to herself. Peggy and Billy knew then why Judge Owl called her the dancing kitchen maid.

"My work is done," sang Marigold, putting away the last dish. "Now I can pretend that I am going to the fancy dress ball of Ned, the handsome young millionaire, there to dance my way into his heart and win his true love."

love."
Judge Owi shuffled and fluttered on his perch in the tree. "Oh, it's too bad! She isn't going to the ball—she is only going to pretend she is going." Marigold danced away into another room, and, while she was gone. Judge Owi whispered to Peggy and Billy as much of ber story as he knew.
"Marigold is an owner."

her story as he knew.

"Marigold is an orphan," he said.

"Once she had a comfortable, happy heme, but her father and mother died, and Marigoid had to go out to work. That is why she is now the kitchen maid of haughty Madam Froud, and the servant of Madam Proud's two selfish cold-eyed daughters, C.arabelle and Annahelle.

one-eyed daughters, C.arabelle and Anabelle.

"Who is Ned?" asked Peggy.

"He is a handsome young millionaire shom Marlam Proud want to marry one of her daughters, either Clarabelle or innabelle. He is giving a fancy dress all tonight at which he will choose a ride. All the wealthy and high born naidons for miles around will be there, and I know Marigold would give the air of her head to go. But, alas, she is only a kitchen maid."

At that moment a radiant young girl lanced out of the room into which Marigold had gone. She was dressed in a parking dress of bright colors which lashed and glittered like a thousand lewels as she floated about in a fairy-like dance.

"Why, it's Marigold!" gasned Peggy.

Making More Money

By Remembering Things When one considers memory as an ad-act to the making of more money, the ames of the men who have established sames of the men who have established schools for memory-training immediately cap into the mind, but Miss Gay Zenola Maclaren, who does so much traveling that she says she hasn't any home, has found a unique way of capitalizing her ability mentally to photograph every word that she hears spoken.

As a child, Miss Maclaren found that she was able to minate, not only the peculiacities, but the most minute infleccream through the column, but if you ask the druggist, I am sure he can tell you of a good one. It would be well to try several until you find one that seems to agree with your skin. Very often it is not possible to find one right away that has the proper effect. You know blue and white are pretty in a sweater or heave and vellow, only and

Ink Stain on Waist

To the Editor of Woman's Page: Dear Madam—Would be very much obliged to you if you would answer these questions as soon as possible. How can I remove an ink stain from a flesh-color georgeste waist?

How can I clean a very fine velve dress? A CONSTANT READER. Mave you tried soap and water for this? Sometimes this will remove ink stains. If it does not remove them, rub lard on them and work it about gently so that the fibers will not be torn. You cannot use the usual ink removers on georgette crepe for it is so delicate that anything strong will injure it.

Things You'll Love to Make

so that the fibers will not be torn. You cannot use the usual ink removers on georgette crepe for it is so delicate that anything strong will injure it.

You would have to steam the velvet dress to clean it, and the easiest way to do this would be to hang it over the bathtub and turn on the water until the steam reaches it. Then brush it all over with a soft brush and let it dry, hanging where nothing car touch it. If this is not satisfactory send it to a processional cleaner, for velvet is very difficult to clean at home. Your other questions will be sent to the People's Forurs.

Several Questions

Dear Madam—When quite a tot I had an abscess on my cheek which was lanced and it has left a scar. I am now quite a young lady the scar on my face is disfiguring. I would like to know if this scar could be removed or if anything could be done to it so it will not remain on my face all my life.

Will you also suggest a goode.

Will you also suggest a good cream to apply to your skin before retiring at night?

I would also like to know what two colors combined would make a pretty sweater. A READER.

You would have to consult a physician about this scar. It is just possible that a slight operation might make it less noticeable, but no one but a physician could tell you about it with any surfacily.

I could not recommend any special
