Dick's Twice-Told Fortune By ELEANOR T. SPERRY "And, Sahib," continued the fortuneteller, seated crosslegged on her unclean mat in the bazaar, "beyond all this high office I see a woman, blue-eyed with sun-gold hair-yes, she who is at your side—sharing your henors. Ah, thanks, Sahib, a thousand thanks! And now will the little Sahiba --- " But Mabeline, flushed and obviously innoyed, had turned away. Intuitively she knew that Dick Trowbridge had paused in the bazaar to cross the old woman's palm with silver for no other cason than to see how his companion would take that which she would so urely hear. That was the whole trouble-the match was too patently cut and

But Madeline, walking quietle back to the compound at Dick's side, was telling herself savagely that if the thing was so evident even to the baziar woman. If served in a sauce of blue flames borwas time to call a halt. And the casiest way to do that would be to accept Aunt Harriet's invitation to visit her in America. Furthermore, she would start immediately and thus avoid any protests or precipitated lovemaking on the part of Dick.

Attrived at her bungalous she would show and served smoking hot.

Served in a sauce of blue flames borrowed for the occasion from "private but it is so hard to put if on and make it sound like anything.
