"Will the Young Man- ?" By J. STUART LANE

By S. STUART LANE

To be alone and friendless in a big city in winter time is dreadful. In autumn it's dreadful. In summer it's treadful. In summer it's treadful. In summer it's treadful. In summer it's dreadful. In summer it's dreadful. In summer it's dreadful. In summer it's greadful. In spring it's unbearable. And friendless. Freda Angel was very, very big. And and the city was very market a big. On this particular morning, however, preda was contemplating double-crossing Mrs. Grundy. In other words, she had made up her mind to scrape achadantance with the young man, yet to do so in a way which would, on the saile neared the corner where she habitually alighted. "Miss Angel—Miss Angel! Some one else to see yer in the front parlor!" The landlady's shrill voice once more broke in upon Freda's musings, this time, however, awakening curiosity but no thrill. She had not dropped two fur neckpleces. After all, surprises frequently arrive unheralded. This time it actually was the desired young man who rose eagerly at Freda's entrance into the shabby parlor.

descended slowly, frantically remorseful new that it was too late, for her dare-devil prank. Bliting her lip, she parted the portieres. Then she halted as if petrified.

"Be you the young leddy what lost this in the bus?" asked a stubby, pale-eyed, mustached individual, holding out her lost fur, "Pr—er—yes!" said Freda weakly mechanically accepting her property.

"Well, I picked it up—" He seemed to be waiting. "You didn't mention no reward—"

Freda's brow wrinkled. Then she said. Dashing upstairs, she returned with her ourse and abstracted the first bill that came handy. "Will this do?"

The man took the bill, turned it over, muttered, "Thank you, Miss," and left the house.

Back in her room, Freda told herself hysterically that it was exactly what she might have expected. More than she might have expected. More than that, it was what she deserved. Hospitals and institutions were made beneficiaries in the will of William P. Thompson, a member of the machinery firm of Thompson Bros., 123 North Fifth street, who died January 2. The will was probated today.

From the estate valued at more than $107,800, $1000 was bequeathed to the Perkins Lodge, F. and A. M.; $2000 to the Masonic Home at Elizabethtown, Pa., and $2000 to the Masonic Home at Broad and Ontario streets.

Any balance remaining is to be given to the Children's Hospital.

"Yes," said the captain genially, the ice now having been broken. "I had the pleasure of driving you out to Devens two months ago."

He paused and smiled and waited for an answering response, now that the talk had got going. But the little conversation had fluttered itself out. It languished right there and died.
