

THE HUSBAND HATER

By HAZEL DEYO BATCHELOR

Jeann Northrup, brought up in luxury, is forced by her father's death to marry a man whom she detests at sight. She goes west with him to his ranch, and a very unhappy marriage results. They become friends, but Dick makes her realize that she should have run away last night and tells her that he will be home in time for her and he will be home in time for her and he will be home in time for her.

"What do you mean, Jeann, of all Dick?" Cicely persisted. "Well, imagine being jealous of Dick. Why he's only a boy. He hasn't grown up yet. He doesn't know what he wants." "I saw him look at you tonight as though he knew what he wanted," Cicely said with a short laugh. "Cicely, don't," Jean protested. "Don't say things like that. Of course, I know that you say them only in fun, but I don't like it, really I don't." "Cicely's eyes blazed suddenly. "Do you know what I think?" she said quickly. "I think you carry this jealousy of yours too far. Heaven, you ought to be glad that other men are attracted to you. Just because you are married doesn't necessarily mean that you are put on the shelf forever." "I know it," Jean said, humbly, "and please don't be angry, dear. I'm tired tonight, and we don't want to say things we'll be sorry for." "Did you ask Dick Mason not to come here?" Cicely asked with cunning intonation. "Why, Cicely?" "But, dear, what makes you ask?" "Because I think you did. When he danced with me afterward and I spoke about it, he tried to evade the subject. Of course, Jean, it's your privilege to see whom you like, but I must say it's going rather far when you forbid a man to come to my home simply because you're afraid of making your husband jealous."

Cicely was eager to talk after they returned from the dance and she was mainly quite anxious to know Dick Mason's letter. "He comes to call very soon," she said eagerly, as, sitting on the bed, she read the letter. "He comes to call very soon," she said eagerly, as, sitting on the bed, she read the letter. "He comes to call very soon," she said eagerly, as, sitting on the bed, she read the letter.
