SUBMARINE SUNK OFF CAPES BY SHIP; CREW OF 22 SAVED

Pilotboat Philadelphia Rams L-1, but Tows Disabled Craft Into Lewes

VESSELS CRASH TOGETHER IN THE DARKNESS AT SEA

Old Pilot Gives Views Regarding Crash at Sea

Captain Lewis Sayres, one of the oldest pilots in service at Cape May, today gave this theory of the cause of the collision between the submarine L-1 and the pilot boat Philadelphia.

The only way that collision could have occurred would have been for the submarine to rise suddenly right under the bow of the Philadelphia when the pilot boat was going full speed ahead.

The United States submarine L-1, a 108-foot 550-ton boat, carrying two officers and twenty enlisted men, was rammed by the pilot boat Philadelphia at 2:30 o'clock this morning off Cape Henlopen, near the Overfalls lightship.

All the men on the submarine escaped injury and stood by the crippled diver until it was towed into the inner harbor behind the old breakerwater near Lewes, Del.

The crash occurred in the dark as the L-1 with three other underwater vessels was coming up from Hampton Roads to the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

Water Outrashes Pumps Rapid orders were shouted by Lieutenant Lark. The pumps were started but could not check the rising water in the engine room.

To Salvage Submarine Calls for help were sent to the Philadelphia Navy Yard. Officers there ordered the navy tug Kalmia from Cape May.

Deceived by Lights Captain Kelly was on the bridge, looking at the lights that appeared off in the ocean. It was extremely dark, with the heavy darkness that comes just before the first streaks of dawn.
