"TYPO" POET NEVER MISSES SEEING HIS VERSE IN PRINT

Edward B. Seymour, of West Philadelphia, "Sets Up" Lines as He Composes, Then "Pulls Proof"—Pays Tribute to Lincoln

Edward B. Seymour, of 743 South Fifty-eighth street, is a literary man who does not use pen, pencil or typewriter. He composes his verse in type, and when he wishes to look over the results of his inspiration he has to do it in a most peculiar way.

His latest verse is the expression of a life-long admiration of Abraham Lincoln. He has always been a reader of the "Lincoln" and has set the Great Liberator up as one of his heroes.

Next day he asked her whose car it was she was riding in the day before.

John J. Egan lives in Weehawken, N. J., and came to Congress the same year Woodrow Wilson was elected President. He is a Democrat and will retire from public life on the 4th of March next.

When he first ran for Congress he played up the theory that it was the schoolteacher's day and the fact of his resemblance to the President. He printed a picture beside that of Wilson and broadcasted them among the voters.

When the tide set in he would not strike his colors. He is going back to Weehawken to teach school. It may be even worse than that. He may have to go to Hoboken. He serves on the appropriations committee with Uncle Johnson. The other day Uncle Joe was telling of the time, twenty years ago when both he and Champ Clark were defeated for Congress.

"However," said Uncle Joe, "it hurts like poison any the same."

Associate Justice William R. Day of the Supreme Court of the United States, is a slim, middle-aged man, 5 feet 11 inches tall, but weighing not more than 120 pounds.

He is, however, the father of two sons, both of whom weigh over 200 and both of whom were a post ball players in their college days.

Not long ago Justice Day's son was in a car which was struck by a car which was driven by a member of her race, and that the two drove away together.

Next day he asked her whose car it was she was riding in the day before.
