"I'd love to take you on a camping trip," said Dick. "Alaska, the Canadian Rockies, on maybe the Grand Canyon, it's wonderful out there."

waiting outside that infernal club? Well, I'm blawed! "But we can't do anything, can we?" queried Mary, "except take it back?"

What Need for Further Warning?

A glance over one newspaper shows these headlines: "Blowers Lie at 28 in Double Shooting," "Fogarty's Bride Tries to End Life Here," "Burglars Marriage Link in Son Tendency," "In the same paper are the identical stories of two girls who stole the love of other women's husbands only to enjoy their art at being cast aside."

overlook the ring of the stolen Rhinoceros, these can be no laughing matter. In anything that is stolen, whether it be gold or love, the world is a small place when one wants to hide, and the same paper are the identical stories of two girls who stole the love of other women's husbands only to enjoy their art at being cast aside.

You cannot be too careful about choosing the appropriate adornment for the time. A simple gold chain with a locket or sapphire is in better form for morning or formal occasions with a simple frock than a more elaborate necklace.

"FIFTY-FIFTY"

By HAZEL DEVO BACHELOR

Copyright, 1921, by Public Ledger Co.

Frances Page wanted to be modern, and so she was wearing a good salary waiting a column for a news paper, she insisted upon paying half the bills after she was married to Jerry. Jerry never thought of his wife as another man and to treat her in accordance, and when the Harlowes moved into the same apartment house, his attitude toward Charissa was such that it would have been a mistake to think of her as a girl who was not in love with him.

CHAPTER XLIX Dreams Come True

FRANCES was so upset by what had happened at the Harlowes' that she did go over and stay with her mother until the day Jerry planned to return. That morning she went back to the apartment and found a pile of mail pushed under her door. It wasn't until she came across a long envelope with the name of an important magazine in the left-hand corner that she remembered her story.

This was the story that she had sent out so confidently. In the excitement of what had happened since Jerry's departure, she had not had time to look it, and certainly she hadn't looked for its return so soon. She held the envelope in her hand for a moment, visualizing the rejection slip within. Somehow she could not bear to see that rejection slip; she felt as if it would stop forever any desire that she might have to write.

She opened it in a moment and then went deliberately to her bedroom, opened the bottom drawer of Jerry's chiffonier, and stowed the envelope and its contents away underneath a pile of underwear.

All that morning she tried not to think of the story she had stowed up, she went out and bought fresh flowers, and finally in the afternoon when Jerry returned she found a little blue note pinned in her heart in the prospect of seeing him again.

Then there was his key in the lock, the door opened and he stood in the doorway and the close clasp of his arms about her. Oh, it was wonderful to have him back, to feel his arms about her, to feel his lips on her lips, to feel his hands on her hands, to feel his feet on her feet, to feel his body on her body, to feel his soul on her soul.

Two mornings later after Jerry had left, a special delivery letter came for Frances. Her letter, which she saw again the name of the magazine that had rejected her story. What could it mean? Was there a great mistake? With trembling fingers she opened the envelope and read the contents of the typeset letter.

"Very truly yours," "MARSHALL FORBES, Editor." Frances felt suddenly that she was someone that she could do something to give vent to her feelings. With the letter in her hand she rushed into the bedroom, jerked out the chiffonier drawer, and drew out the envelope. Yes, there was her story and there was the letter, a wonderful, flattering kind of letter, filled with all manner of nice comments about her work. It couldn't be true. It simply wasn't possible that she, Frances Page, had written a story worthy of publication in the "Century," and yet she held the tangible proof of it in black and white, right before her.

STUDY YOUR STYLE AND DRESS UP TO IT

Many an Attractive Woman Has Been Spoiled by Her Failure to Wear Clothes That Bring Out Her Particular Charm

"I remember that if you dress a part you will look that part," warns an advisor of girls on the matter of summer clothes. "Under the flippant hat is often a flippant mind. The public has come to believe it."

You know the story of the man who saw a girl dressed gaily abroad on the street, and hastening forward to catch a glimpse of the pretty face that he expected to see under the giddy hat, discovered his own grandmother.

Of course, the story was exaggerated, but it had its moral as well as its point. The girl or woman who doesn't study her own particular style until she knows just what will and what will not be becoming to her, is not going to make the most of her looks.

The tailor-made girl, for instance, who appears in a ruffled organdie blouse with a curled ostrich feather around her hat, a fancy suit and gaudy shoes, looks like an exhibition in the window who has got on the wrong platform.

You wonder how she can be comfortable herself. A little girl with naturally wavy hair who would look low down and twisted if her hair were piled up in a soft, loose knot, and her clothes were brown, tan, yellow and dark red.

She lets her hair wash down, draped on both sides of her face and twisted in a commonplace, unbecoming little round knot right at the back of her head.

And she wears dead old rose with a little touch of dull blue! It isn't a question of expense or anything like that. She could get becoming clothes as inexpensively, perhaps less so, as she gets these things which take all the color out of her face and all the light out of her eyes.

She looks like an insignificant, ordinary, plain young woman. Really, she is capable, attractive and just a bit whimsical. She ought to play up her attractiveness, but all she does is accentuate her plainness.

THEN there is the older woman whose charm lies in her smile, herself, her personality. And it is all very charming. Her clothes, if she were dressed by this clothes expert, would be merely a background for her, just simple, becoming, stylish things, with no particular feature about them except their perfect fit.

Her hats would be simple, almost severe affairs, and if she wore a veil, it would be a plain mesh, trimly pinned at the back of her head. She would make her own personality her own.

It manages to emerge and you have

Things You'll Love to Make

Comfort Auto Veil

We all know how annoying it is to have one's hair flying about while working. This "COMFORT" AUTO VEIL will prevent any such discomfort. From the center of a piece of chiffon one and one-half yards square, cut a circle eight inches in diameter. Make a bias casing around the circular opening and bring it up through the center of one side, three inches from the edge, through a band of two-inch velvet ribbon. Make this band long enough to fit comfortably around your head. Close it with a snap fastener. Finish at the back with loops and ends of the velvet. When ready to take a "snap" slip your "COMFORT" AUTO VEIL over your shoulder caps. The elastic will hold it firmly around the ears, across the neck, and band about your neck and you are ready to ride in comfort. FLORA
