CHAPTER III Spike in that homeward journey from be stage door seemed to sense a hiden admiration for him in Gypsy. But it was different from other girls. Spike was impetuous and flushed with the vigor and youth of his handsome body and he deliberately walked into dypsy's room. This was violently resented by her, but she did not fear him, for she knew she had a power over him that he could not fathom nor could he understand.

Billy, with his pure, sweet love, had become very jenious of the many admirers of Gypsy. He had given Gypsy an oath, upon receiving from her lips the words that she had been bothered by many men, but one was "Oh! so terrible." that he would kill any person that troubled her.

Billy was passing a flower cart and he bought some flowers for Gypsy. They were white roses. He went to her door to knock, but besitated. He was too timid to enter should the word "Come in" pass through. He placed them on the door knob and retired, only to think at the foot of the stairs that he should leave a note. It was simple and read: The center rose is so white and pure. That's you.

Spike's entrance iuto Gypsy's room, though resented, was not without its determined purpose. He had tried to kiss her at the foot of the stairs in bidding her good-night. The snappy reprimand of Gypsy was the spur to good his vanity. goad his vanity.
