

HUMANITY FIRST, SAYS MME. CURIE

Noted Woman Savant Refuses to Let Science Deaden Her Sympathies

DENIES THAT PIN STORY

New York, May 16.—Madame Marie Curie has been in this country only five days, yet she has managed to attract the attention of a woman of her own sex, and to do so in a way that has followed her swift travels through the three women's colleges, which set the standard of high scholarship and high character.

It is a strange thing that this woman, hailed as the greatest woman scientist of her time, and the peer of the greatest men scientists, should request her friends to deny for her the famous story of the student who swallowed a pin on the ground that this story makes her appear unkind to the girl.

The legend runs that one day in her laboratory a girl swallowed a pin and came running to her terror-stricken, only to be absent-mindedly reassured: "Never mind, my dear, I'll give you another."

Science Not Unkind

"I should not like to have credit for such absorption in my work," Mme. Curie protests gently. "You see, science ought not to make people unkind, and that story sounds as if I thought my work was more important than the young girl's sufferings."

"If it were true that science makes people unkind to one another, then neither I nor any one else ought to study science any more. All study is for the purpose of helping civilization, to help people to live together more comfortably and happily; if science defeats this purpose, it makes us thoughtless of other people's troubles, then it is defeating the very purpose for which it exists."

This theory illumines many of the little acts of gentle courtesy which have already endeared Mme. Curie to the friends who have traveled with her in the first few days of her visit to America. The other day at Smith College the French classes presented her with an enormous bunch of crimson roses. Madame buried her tired face in their fragrance and then lifted eyes filled with grateful tears.

Sends Roses to Sick Girl

"Such beautiful flowers you have in your country," she said. Her hands lingered caressingly on the velvet petals, and she tucked a bud into her queer little French bonnet. But the next morning when President Neilson and other dignitaries were packing the roses into the automobile which was to convey her to Vassar College, Madame gave up her roses with a sudden little depressing laugh.

"They are so beautiful," she said, "but I heard you speak last night of a young French girl who is ill. I should like her to have the roses."

The same thing happened in New York before Mme. Curie started on her journey to Smith College on Friday morning. Her rooms were filled with imposing floral offerings from many admirers which seemed doomed to wither in solitude, but Mme. Curie's quick mind had found a substitute for that wastefulness.

"I hate to cause you so much trouble," she said to her hostess, Mrs. William Brown Meloney, "but is there not a hospital—perhaps for children—where the flowers could be sent?"
