

DREAMLAND ADVENTURES

The Grateful Dandelion by DADDY

CHAPTER V.

The Terrible Storm

Peggy and Billy felt themselves tossed about wildly as the furious storm struck the dandelion. The flowers, which they had sought refuge after, were blown about as if they were leaves of paper. The sheets of water that swept by them were like walls of fire.

The two children crouched low and clung to the dandelion stems, but when the wind died down they were blown off the tower, and then they were blown into the clutches of the swirling water beneath them.

The storm was the strangest storm they had ever seen. The sun was shining brightly, yet the water was falling down in a blinding fury. Where was it coming from? For no clouds were in the sky.

Then Peggy and Billy heard a shrill cry of pain. "I'm making it rain on you!" it said. "I'm making it rain on you!" it said. "I'm making it rain on you!" it said.

They looked through the pelting rain, and far away they saw where the deluge came from. It was coming from the nozzle of a gigantic hose. And the hose was Tommy, the giant boy. He was causing all the awful storm.

Now when Peggy and Billy saw that Tommy was making the storm, they felt a little less scared than when they thought it was a really, truly hurricane. Indeed, so far as they were concerned, it was just as bad as a really, truly hurricane. They were as small as ants, and the hose storm was plenty hard enough to smash down the dandelion tower and hurl them to the mercy of the wriggly old snake-like worm waiting hungrily below. Indeed, it looked as if they might be washed away any moment.

And then the dandelion itself saved them. How could the dandelion save them? It closed up its petals, making a snug, tight bud, with them safely inside. Then the dandelion tossed and swayed in the hose storm without suffering any damage. The storm kept up for a few minutes longer, growing worse all the time, and the giant boy dragged the nozzle nearer and nearer. Then suddenly the storm ceased. It was followed at once by loud yells and wails and screams, mixed in with a heavy whacking noise. Things sounded as if a monster were being murdered. The dandelion opened its petals as the water stopped sweeping over it and Peggy and Billy looked out to see whence the yells and wails and screams were coming. When they saw they began to laugh.

What that huge bird was and what it did will be told tomorrow.
