

THE DAILY NOVELETTE

The Joy of Living
By MARY WINIFRED FORD

The young folks in Northwood called him "granda," while the older folks called him "Old Nat."

Grandpa had decided long ago that it was high time for him to say "good-by" to this old world. He felt he was in the way; that the world would be far better off without him, and today, while he sat huddled up in that old rocking chair, puffing away at his pipe, voices floated from another room nearby into grandpa's favorite sitting room, and what he heard made him long for the end to come. He was more than convinced that he was in the way.

"Well, don't blame me, Grace," grandpa heard Richard, her husband, say. "If it wasn't for your father we could be where it is nice and warm, but you know the trip is too much for him, and then he might be sitting—"

That was all grandpa heard, but his son-in-law's words wrung his very heart, and not once but often he heard his daughter complain and say that "if it wasn't for father" she could do that, or she could do that, Grace, his little girl whom he had worked so hard for. When she had cried or fussed he had never complained, but always had endeavored to please and cater to her slightest whim; now she no longer waited for him, her father. Were they waiting for the day that he, too, was praying would soon come—that very hour, if possible?

He turned to look out the window, and there, smiling in at him with two fat snowballs in her hands, was Edna, the young girl next door, who had taken quite a fancy to that old face looking out of the window every day as she looked in. Her cheeks were rosy and her brown eyes sparkling, and into grandpa's heart came new life as she smiled on him, and as he noticed the youth bubbling in her eyes, he no longer at that moment had his youth over again, to be as strong and healthy as she was.

She came close to the window and rubbed her nose on the pane, and, laughing happily, cried: "Grandpa, they have given me permission to come in and sit with you if you care to have me, and at this moment Grace came into the room and espied the fair face at the window."

"Come right in, Edna. I'm sure father would enjoy having you," and grandpa was so happy all he could do was to puff all the harder at the old pipe, his heart beating fast to think that for the first time Grace came to sit and chat with him.

"Oh, grandpa, it is just too wonderful for words out today! How I wish you could come and see me with me! The girls have gone off for the week-end and I have to go shoeing alone. Do you know, grandpa, if it wasn't for you looking out of the window every day and smiling at me, I should almost die of loneliness. True, the girls are here off and on, but they have such wonderful times without me. They don't want me, grandpa—I'm only in the way."

"Why, what is the trouble, little missy? When I saw you out there, laughing away, I thought you were unhappy. Now, tell grandpa all about it—maybe I can help you."

"Well, they all have sweethearts, grandpa. I see—Frank and the Rhodes boys. I often wondered why you were alone so much."

"Well, they don't want me, as I would be an extra one and—well, sometimes I wish I were dead. It's terrible to think no one wants you, and then, grandpa, mamma and papa—I stay there, they say, 'I'm so lonely, and oh! I'm so lonesome. Since the snow came, and I can't sit with you on the veranda, I've been too lonesome for words. I wish you could come out.'"

"Yes, little missy, it is hard to think that you are not welcome, even in your own home, but I am sure your dear mother and father welcome you, only they do not realize that you are very lonesome. They are probably very busy with their problems and never dream that you need their love so very much. Some day you will meet a nice young boy who will want you very much, but he hasn't happened along just yet, that's all."

"Just you wait, missy dear, and then you will have the best of them all," and grandpa puffed ever so vigorously at his pipe, and in the circles of smoke he saw the one he wished Edna to see and love.

"Never mind, grandpa, about my troubles. Don't think any more about it. I am happy to have just you, and I do love you very much," and she nearly knocked grandpa's pipe clean out of his mouth when she hugged him tight and kissed him softly on the forehead, and she was gone before he could recover himself.

"Another visitor, grandpa, for you," and George smiled as he slipped grandpa's cap off his shoulder.

"Why, grandpa, who was that wonderful looking young lady I met as I was coming in? I should think, grandpa, you wouldn't keep such a secret away from me."

"Gad, boy! I was just thinking of you and in you walk! She is one of my rays of sunshine, boy, and you are the other. She is very unhappy and is going over to shoeing. Go right after her, boy, and see that she gets home safely. Yes, yes, you must do this for me. Tell her that grandpa said it was all right, and that she will make him happy if she is very kind to you, George," and the somewhat dazed George hastened away.

"Late in the afternoon grandpa saw in the distance two people slipping along, hand in hand. As they neared the house his heart gave a leap. There they were, like two children, laughing and chatting away."

"Grandpa, I couldn't have been unkind to him if I tried, not when he told me you said it was all right. And oh, grandpa, I must thank you for the most wonderful day ever."

"And, grandpa, you must insist that she allow me to accompany her to a perfectly wonderful-to-be bungalow party tonight. She is waiting for you to say the word," and as dear old grandpa saw in both their eyes that they were not saying a lie, he realized that he desired to live—live—live!

For Bobbed Hair
Coffin bands coming down over the forehead and fastening under the hair at the sides have been seen much lately. For bobbed-haired sisters are coming in for a great deal of attention at the hands of the designers of accessories, and for their adornment all manner of fillets in pasted-feather and in flower effects. These bands go straight over the head and certainly do give the last pictorial touch to these early Flapper heads. Even ostrich feather bands are being tried out for the shorn.

CORINE LOWE.

Couch Covers
Durable and pretty portieres and couch-covers are made from brown denim simply worn the goods for a wide flap over onto the right side and stitched in a neat, light tan border. They are washable. Modern. MODERN FASHIONS.
