ON AN OLD BATTLEFIELD TESREAU'S BEARS

By GRANTLAND RICE

Somewhere in France, June 9. ET thy softest sleep come to them. L Where their dreams are long and deep.

Let Thy gentlest gray winds woo them Where the summer shadows oreep.

For they met their last endeavor Where the crosses mark their name, And they hold the line forever Where the poppies flash to flame.

DO THEY know the thunder's over Of the cannonading guns As they dream beneath the clover

Where some singing river runs? Do they know that down breaks gently Where no zero hour waits, Where no raw soul waits intently On the order of the Fates?

DO THEY miss the muffled tramping Where with rifle and with pack Old-remembered mates were camping

For another down attack? Do they hear the bugles playing In the marches of their dreams, As the summer winds come straying By the valleys and the streams?

YES, I know the war is over Where their grosses dot the glen, And that Time, the ancient rover, Will not come their way again. And from June beyond December They have known their final play Where a world may not remember

Any longer than a day. BUT with eyes half closed and dreaming We can hear the drumfire roll, Where the big shells echoed, screaming, And the shrapnel sought its goal.

And the dreamers in this City Of the Long and Silent Night Were not objects of your pity But the paladins of right.

And a rifle red with rust.

WELL, perhaps it doesn't matter In the scramble known as life. They are safe beyond the clatter And the enarling and the strife. And though time nor fate rewards them There is peace within the dust.

Where an ancient helmet guards them
