The Porcupine Girl

SHE was a very pretty, vivacious young woman, with magnetism and charm. The first impression she made was most pleasing.

WINIFRED HARPER COOLEY

It was a great shock to me when she was so suddenly and so completely changed.

She was a high-strung girl who seemed to be in a constant state of nervous tension.

Now, separation is a blessing in many cases. There are temperaments so incompatible that living under one roof is hell on earth.

I gave up—perhaps the husband was a monster; possibly the wife had been a victim of a delusional affectionate girl.

They all think I'm had clean through, and I deserve it. Dad will never forgive me and I've resigned myself to my sorry, mother, I want you to know that.

Mrs. Harmon was crying softly and Charley went on speaking as though he had to tell her what was in his heart. But he was telling her about it, and the excitement would have blown over and he could come back to New York again.

THE TRAGEDY OF WANTING WHAT SHE CANNOT HAVE

Is Very Deep in the Case of the Red-Haired Girl Who Adores Pink—The Fact That Her Wish Is Silly Only Makes It Worse

THERE are tragedies all about us that we never see, seldom realize, and most of the time utterly ignore.

But, oh, how deep they are to those who must endure them.

For instance, the girl who adores pink.

Her favorite fairy was pink, her dolls always were pink dresses, she liked strawberry ice-cream and pink roses.

As she grew up she longed for pink chambrey dresses, pink taffeta ribbons and pink and white checked gingham.

All her friends last summer wore dainty pink georgette hats; pink linen morning dresses seem to be the thing this year.

Every time she passes a window of pink things she stops and yearns for them with a heavy heart.

She cannot wear pink because her hair is that beautiful half-gold, half-copper shade that we call red!

HER tragic sounds trivial to girls whose olive skins and brown curls respond so prettily to the influence of pink frock.

The girl with very light hair and clear skin, who always wears blue to match her eyes, can't understand why anybody would waste her life worrying about a color.

The red-haired girl knows that her great desire is silly; that it is impossible, that she might just as well learn to love green and blue and stop wishing.

But, oh, how she does love pink! How often she promises herself that if she ever has a dark-haired child of her own, she will dress it in pink, even if it is a sturdy, stubby-nosed boy who ought to wear browns.

Why doesn't she go ahead and wear pink, in spite of tradition? Well, she did, one time.

Her family exclaimed, protested, shrieked disapproval. Her friends looked at her quizzically and said: "What a pretty dress!"

The boys—she was at the age that has to suffer from the remarks of boys—had various uncomplimentary things to say, and every time she passed one of them in the hall at school, she would whistle in time to her talking until she almost ran away from him.

No, that one experience taught her that there is no greater suffering than being deprived of the thing you love best.

THEN there's the demure little girl, I just made for pretty things like pink, light blue and flowered dainties, who loves red.

Condemned for life to "sweet and girlish" colors and styles, she gets her sharpest trials at sight of the scarlet-clad vampire on the stage, the flirtatious wearer of the startling red hat on the subway every morning.

Oh, if she could just once have something flaming, striking, red, that naughty color which would look so out of place on her!

And the girl whose locks are stringy and lank—how she would love to be curly and cute, just once!

The cute little girl—oh, if she could just once in her life be called anything but "little!"

SILLY wishes, foolish, unnecessary, impossible to hope for aren't they? Senseless to let such trivial worries take up their time?

Perhaps they are; but if they are, they know it better than anybody else, and that only makes the tragedy deeper. To want something you can't have is bad enough.

But to want something you can't have, to know you can't have it, and to realize you are wanting it, is just that very much worse.

Because, no matter how impossible you know it is, no matter how silly you know you are, you still wish, oh, how you wish, that you had just one, that you could wear pink—just once!
