Hot Hottentots
By DADDY

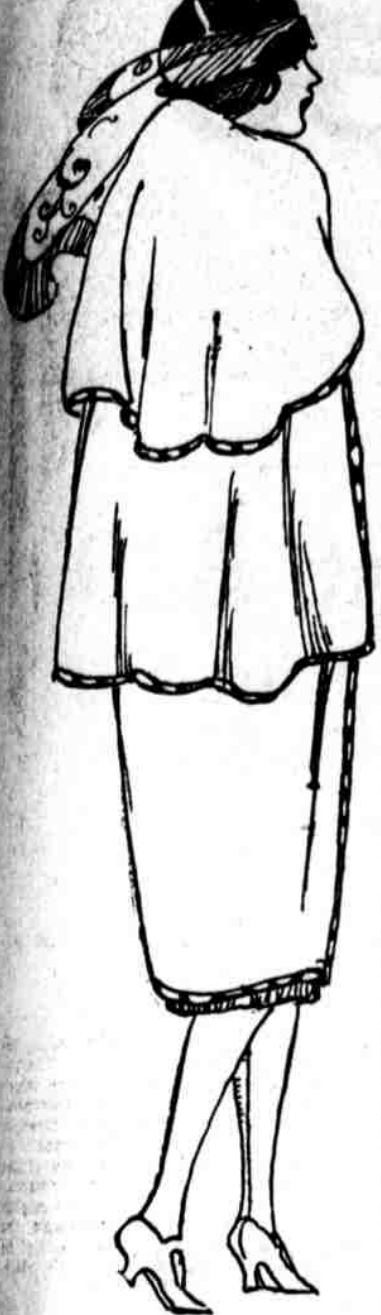

CHAPTER V
Peggy Peppers the Stew

At the black Savages in Mighty Spear's village gathered around the new pot. They were eager for the feast which their chief was preparing so they might make merry over the wedding with the captive chocolate-eating girl. Each savage held a gourd ready to fill as soon as the stew was done. And the biggest gourd of all was held by Mighty Spear himself.

On the ground was the Youth of the Lion Heart whom Mighty Spear was feeding on hot coals while the villagers looked on with interest.

Up above hidden in the tree, were Peggy, Billy and Folly Wisner, the gobblers, looking down. Hanging from the...

SMART CAPES SHOW TREND OF THE STYLE

By CORINNE LOWE

This wrap, designed for travel, for cool days by ocean or in the mountains, for morning and for street wear in the city, is typical here in a smart imported model of navy blue wool with blue and white striped braid defining the three flounces. Many of such capes are trimmed with braid or else with fine ribbon. When these two devices are rejected, it is in favor of bands of self-material in contrasting tint.

For dressier occasions one finds the cape de chine or Canton crepe wrap, and in the evening one selects satin, tulle or overlaid folds of georgette in various rainbow tints.

Peggy's shoulder was the overflowing sack of red pepper which had come in answer to her wish. Now that Peggy had the pepper she didn't know what to do with it. How was she going to feed it to the Savages?

Just then a puff of smoke flew into the faces of the women who were stirring the stew, causing them to cough and gasp. That puff showed Peggy how she might use the red pepper. She took a handful of the pepper, and, reaching far out from her nest in the tree, she let it drop through the branches into the pot of stew. Another handful, another and another she dropped, and the hungry savages, seeing only the smoke, did not know what she was doing.

The smoke blew away and the savage women stirred the stew again. The red pepper made it smell even more savory than before, and the warriors began to beat impatiently on their gourds. They were anxious to begin eating.

Mighty Spear now stood forward and filled his own big gourd with stew. Then he gave a signal and all the warriors, all the women, all the black boys and all the black girls filled their gourds with stew. But while the savages licked their lips in greedy impatience, they did not dare taste the stew until Chief Mighty Spear tasted it first.

Chief Mighty Spear grinned mockingly at the Youth of the Lion Heart. "You shall feast, too," sneered Chief Mighty Spear. "You shall feast on hot coals while we feast on hot wedding stew."

At that Chief Mighty Spear raised the gourd to his lips and drew a huge swallow of stew, gulping it down as fast as he could.

At the very same moment each savage in the village, young and old alike, raised his gourd and gulped down the stew, eating as though they had been starving for a week.

And then the red pepper stung them. It bit their tongues, it scorched their throats, it set fire to their stomachs.

"Ow!" they gasped. "Ow!" They opened their mouths wide; they danced, they yelled, they turned somersaults, they squirmed on the ground; they seemed to have gone mad.

"Wow!" shouted Billy, forgetting in his excitement to keep silent. "Wow! Those Hottentots are hot now! Wow!"

Billy and Folly Wisner laughed until they cried. But Peggy only grinned. She threw handful after handful of red pepper down upon the blazing fire.

The smoke of the red pepper spread among the gasping savages, it made them gulp; it made them screw up their faces; it tickled their noses; it made them sneeze, sneeze, sneeze!

With his very first sneeze Billy pulled out his handkerchief.

"Cover your mouth and nose," he cried to Peggy and Folly Wisner, and they did as he did. "Now is the time to rescue the captive girl and the Youth of the Lion Heart," said Billy.

And it did seem the proper time for the hot Hottentots were burning and sneezing and smarting, so they could think only of themselves.

Billy, Peggy and Folly Wisner climbed out of the nests and slid down the tree. How they rescued the captive lovers will be told tomorrow.

Summer Suits

Paris sends us definite word of the summer fashions which are being worn. We learn that the severe tailored jacket—fitted to the waistline and slightly flaring over the hips, with smart mannish revers and pockets—has given place with the approach of warm weather, to the loose, straight or slightly flaring jacket above the conventional narrow skirt. These loose coats are made of gabardine, poplin, serge or kasha and are usually bound on the edges with braid or smarter still, with a fold of the material.—Good Housekeeping.

Paint and Powder

In the middle of the eighteenth century the women of Vienna were prohibited by law from painting their faces.

The poorest Arab woman paints her eyes black to make them appear larger and more brilliant.
