

RED FLAGS FLYING AT SILESIAN MINES

Korfanty's Insurgents Mutiny and Form Polish Communist Army

Special Cable Dispatch. Copyright, 1921. Berlin, June 17.—Bolshevik outbreaks in Upper Silesia, due to the Entente's incapability of acting firmly and decisively on account of friction between the British and French, are now assuming first importance in certain districts, according to reliable reports from Beuthen and Pless.

Polish workmen have raised the red flag over coal mines in the central industrial zone. In the Pless district a detachment of Korfanty's army revolted and formed a "Commando Polish-Red army," and then terrorized the region in which it was quartered. Great disappointment is felt in certain quarters in Berlin because of the latest developments, as the British seemed to be slowly but surely restoring order. The Berlin press is quoting British liberal newspapers, which claim that the French political control of Upper Silesia prevents General Hanke from carrying out his plan which restored order, without bloodshed, in a part of the disordered region. Yesterday British troops occupied Turtentag quietly. The Germans declare the British and Italians could occupy the entire country if given a free hand.

Special Cable Dispatch. Copyright, 1921. Polish Insurgent Headquarters, Upper Silesia, June 17.—Far from restoring its prestige, the Inter-Allied Commission, through the Blotnitz disarmament promises, once more lessened its authority in Upper Silesia.

With the evacuation of the first zone by the rebels and Germans set for last Tuesday, the commission at the last moment ordered Korfanty's troops to remain in their advance positions. Since then both camps have been marking time and many things may happen.

While the reason given to the Poles for the sudden change in the evacuation plans was couched in vague terms it was unnecessary, as the German leaders so far have refused to accept the commission's program, one of the features of which was for the Poles to police the Korfanty territory with their own militia.
