Disarmament seems also to have reached the expert stage. There is no other way to account for the lack of toward cutting the expense of naval competition among the great powers. Everybody is for an agree-ment to limit naval building publicly and privately. This Government and that of Great Britain and Japan have given assurances of their eagerness to co-operate, and there the thing stops. As in everything there is no diffi-culty about the general principle. Naval expenditures must be limited how limited? Apparently the compact traverses our policy in the Far East and in that way bears upon the possibility of limiting the development of the navy. On all sides the President is compassed by difficulties in bringing about prompt action for the reduction of expenditures and taxation. The difficult ties are presented by diplomacy, by an undisciplined party, by the disagreement of experts. Public impatience is having its effect upon nerves and tempers down here. But the difficulties are more or less inevitable. The President is not to blame for them.
